PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SEVENTIETH CONGRESS FIRST SESSION

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, April 4, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and everliving God, the source of all being and life, whose mercies are infinite and whose love is unceasing, send Thy blessing upon all who are in authority in this land and all who guide the thought of Thy people, that pure ideals may inspire us, that beauty may crown our common life, and that vision, without which the people perish, may be kept alive in our midst. Give us calm serenity and steadfastness of purpose in the face of life, with its gleams and shadows, its ecstasy and pain, its olive wreath and crown of thorns, its glories and its Golgothas, that we may grow up into the perfection of Thy Son, who dreamed only of mankind's redemption and died to make that dream come true. Grant this for His sake, who was lifted up that He might draw all men unto Him, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, April 2, 1928, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN IMMIGRATION LAW—SEPARATED FAMILIES

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 122) to permit admission within the quota of relatives of declarants who have been admitted to the United States prior to July 1, 1924, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask that certain statements explaining the terms of the joint resolution and the effect it will have in tending to correct and remedy what many consider are unreasonable features of the present immigration law may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, briefly, the resolution seeks to admit within two years the members of the families of alien immigrants who have declared their intention to become American citizens without increasing the total number of immigrants authorized under present law. It merely prefers the families of alien declarants over other prospective immigrants seeking admission into the United States.

This measure is sponsored and indorsed by the following national organizations: National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association, American Federation of Labor, National Women's Trade Union League, National Catholic Welfare Council, National Council of Catholic Women, National Council of Jewish Women, and the Foreign Language Information Service, all of which organizations are desirous of obtaining relief for the separated families of alien immigrants without in any way affecting the restrictive features of the present immigration law by increasing the number of immigrants who are now permitted to enter the country under the general quota.

I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The motion was agreed to.

The statements presented by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts are as follows:

STATEMENT UPON THE FAMILY AND THE IMMIGRATION LAW

DID YOU KNOW

That many residents of the United States have been separated from their families and deprived of home life in consequence of the immigration law? When, suddenly and without warning, the so-called quota law went into effect July 1, 1924, it became impossible for resident aliens previously legally admitted to this country to bring their wives and children to join them. The plight of these men is tragic for them and bad for the community.

They came expecting to bring their families as soon as they could earn enough money to send for them, and thus to reestablish their homes here. They are acceptable to the country and expect to become citizens when they can. Some came early in 1924. Others came just before the war and had been unable to locate their families in devastated regions in time to bring them in before the quota law went into effect. Many will eventually become citizens and bring their families outside the quota, but—

MEANWHILE

Husbands and wives will be growing further apart; the children are missing the American education that would fit them for life in the country that will be theirs; money must be sent to support the families abroad that would otherwise be spent here. Is it any wonder if many become embittered and hopeless and ask whether America does not believe in homes and family life?

THERE IS A REMEDY

Senate Joint Resolution 122, introduced by Senator WALSH of Massachusetts, would—

Divide the quota for all countries into two equal parts.

Administer one-half just as the entire number is now administered.

Let the other 50 per cent be thrown into a common quota fund, from which, for a period of two years, quota numbers will be given only to families of alien residents who were in the United States before July 1, 1924, numbers to be given according to priority of application and only upon petition of relatives here.

THIS WILL NOT

Break down our restrictive policy;

Add a single individual to the present annual immigration;

Add to the class of "nonquota immigrants";

Require new administrative machinery.

IT WILL

Make it possible for all families to be reunited within two years.

STATEMENT ON RELIEF FOR SEPARATED FAMILIES

This measure would divide the quota for all countries into two equal parts.

Administer one-half just as the entire number is now administered.

Throw the other half into a common quota fund for a period of two years only.

From this half of the quota (called in the bill the quota fund) numbers will be given only to families of alien residents who were in the United States before July 1, 1924, and to unmarried children under 21 and parents of citizens. Numbers will be given according to priority of application, and only upon petition of relatives here.

This is not an amendment to the immigration law but a temporary measure designed to reunite, within a two-year period, all families separated in consequence of the immigration law of 1924, the so-called "quota law."

It will not "let down the bars" nor change the restrictive policy that is fundamental in our present law.

It will not increase the class known as "nonquota immigrants."

It will not add a single immigrant to the total number now admitted annually in the quota.

It will not require new administrative machinery.

It will allow families to enter as regular quota immigrants.

It will make it possible for all families to be reunited within the next two years.

It will enable all residents to spend their earnings in support of families in this country.

It will clear up the matter of separated families once for all.

It will reduce the number of nonquota immigrants for all future years.

AGRICULTURE AND THE MECHANIC ARTS

Mr. BAYARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9495) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. NYE, the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8487) to adjudicate the claims of homestead settlers on the drained Mud Lake bottom, in the State of Minnesota, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. KEYES, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9363) to provide for the completion and repair of customs buildings in Porto Rico, and it was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

INVESTIGATION OF PATENT OFFICE PROCEDURE

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 188), which was referred to the Committee on Patents:

Whereas there are awaiting action in the United States Patent Office more than 95,000 applications for patents, many of which have been pending without action for from six to eight months; and

Whereas it usually requires from two to seven years after application for a patent to issue from the Patent Office, during which time the applicant is powerless to protect his invention against infringers, with the result that inventions which might be effective in promoting new industries often, because of the delay in the Patent Office, lose their effectiveness and value; and

Whereas the procedure of the Patent Office to determine priority of invention as between applicants claiming the same invention is unsatisfactory and expensive, and attempts to adjudicate valuable rights between parties without the procedure and facilities of equity courts of the United States, which permits such Patent Office practice to be abused by unscrupulous parties to exhaust the resources of bona fide inventors and to delay and prevent the issue of patents to applicants who are justly entitled thereto; and

Whereas the practice of the Patent Office in interference cases operates in many instances to cause forfeiture and abandonment of valid applications for patentable inventions; and

Whereas it is claimed that the present practice of the Patent Office tends to give undue advantage to unscrupulous persons who intervene dishonestly in order to prevent the issue of patents to competing inventions and who otherwise throw applications into interference in order to extort and exact money as an inducement to waive adverse claims; and

Whereas it is claimed that patents of great advantage to the industry and economy of the country have been and are being bought up by trusts and monopolies in order to prevent the use of such inventions by competitors, which practice results in the suppression of such inventions as far as service to the industries of the country is concerned; and

Whereas it is claimed that patented inventions affecting certain industries are by a system of exclusive cross-licensing made the instruments of monopolistic domination of such industries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of the Senate appoint a special committee to consist of five Senators, which committee is authorized to investigate and appraise the present practice and procedure of the United States Patent Office, to discover any evils which may exist in relation thereto and particularly any evils which may exist with respect to the practice and procedure in interference cases, to study ways and means for revising and improving Patent Office procedure, to investigate the extent to which suppression of the use of patents and the cross licensing of patents contribute to monopoly or to the monopolistic control of industry; and to recommend such amendatory and corrective legislation as may be found to be necessary to correct abuses and to insure the maximum of protection to inventors, to scientists, and to the industries of the country; said committee is authorized to administer oaths, to send for persons and papers, to employ necessary clerical and technical assistance, to sit during the recesses of Congress, and is instructed to report at the first session of the Seventy-first Congress.

THE COTTON-CLOTH INDUSTRY AND IMPORTS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am about to request the insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of a letter from the Tariff Commission, and I should like to preface the request by a brief statement.

Mr. President, on May 12, 1924, a resolution presented by me was adopted by the Senate, requesting a report of the United States Tariff Commission on the then extensive depreciation in and the effect of imports upon the cotton-cloth industry. On June 7, 1924, the United States Tariff Commission transmitted its report in response to my resolution, which report was printed as Senate Document 150, Sixty-eighth Congress.

Recently—namely on March 10, last—I addressed an inquiry to the United States Tariff Commission upon the suggestion of one of the cotton textile manufacturers of Massachusetts for information in regard to the extent of importations of cotton cloth in order to find out whether increased imports were in any appreciable manner responsible for the long-continued curtailment in the cotton-textile industry.

The commission in its letter states that the amount of imports of cotton cloth have not differed very much from the normal average of the last six tariff acts. The letter also confirms what was stated in the report of 1924, namely, "that the bulk of the imported cloth was sold on the American market at higher prices than those of the nearest comparable domestic cloth." In a word, the letter of the commission states that conditions have not changed for years in so far as cotton-cloth imports are affecting the domestic market.

Mr. President, I ask that a letter from the Yorke Manufacturing Co., of Boston, Mass., and the letter from the Tariff Commission, together with the table accompanying the letter, may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They indicate that imports of cotton cloths are apparently not the cause of the long depression in this industry, now extending over a period of about five years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). Without objection, the letters and table will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

YORKE MANUFACTURING CO.,
Boston, Mass., March 8, 1928.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR:

* * * * * * *

For your own information, if you care to use it, I would like to point out to you that the imports of foreign textile products are again growing. The last report, if I am correctly informed, shows importations of over 5,000,000 yards per month. This is positively hurting New England, as we can not meet the price at which they are coming in.

Now, again, this information may be of some value to you. The present rate of tariff on such goods as made in our New England mills is based on "finished goods," and to get around this many goods are coming in in larger volume in what we class as "gray goods" (unfinished state), and being finished here. Not knowing what this loophole might be, I am simply passing it on to you, as I know you desire to be posted on matters pertaining to New England, and the above pertains especially to New Bedford and Fall River mills.

With kindest regards, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

FRED W. STEELE, Treasurer.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, March 29, 1928.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Your letter of March 10 was duly received, with inclosure of a communication from Fred W. Steele, treasurer York Manufacturing Co., Boston, Mass.

* * * * * * *

In compliance with your request for information in regard to the importation of cotton cloth, there has been compiled a table, of which a copy is inclosed, showing imports under the last six tariff acts. This table covers the period from October 6, 1890, the beginning of the tariff act of 1890, to the end of the calendar year 1927, the latest period for which data are available. During this period of 13,600 days, or 37.26 years, imports of cotton cloth averaged 68,133,679 square yards per year of 365 days.

The data in Table 7 shows that Mr. Steele is correct in his statement that imports of cotton cloth exceed 5,000,000 square yards per month. Imports were 64,317,508 square yards in 1927 and 61,005,063 square yards in 1926. These amounts, however, may be considered as normal since they do not differ very much from the annual average, above stated, for the last six tariff acts.

As shown in Table 7, cotton-cloth imports were unusually large in the 1920–1925 period. The largest importation, of 206,146,780 square yards, occurred in 1923. This appears to have been due largely to the unusually low price of Egyptian cotton, which is used in most of the imported cloths, relative to the price of American cottons, which are used in most of the domestic cloths. With the restoration, after 1924, of the normal ratio between Egyptian and American cottons, imports of cotton cloth have dropped to a normal level.

In the Tariff Commission's "Report on the Cotton-Cloth Industry" (S. Doc. 150, printed in 1924), a copy of which is inclosed herewith, it was stated that the bulk of the imported cloths were sold on the American market at prices higher than those of the nearest comparable domestic cloths. Although the commission has not undertaken any recent field investigation of this subject, such data as are available tend to show that relationship still to exist.

In regard to the point raised by Mr. Steele that a large proportion of the total cotton-cloth imports enter in the gray (unbleached) state, it may be noted that this is not a new departure, but has been the normal condition in this line for a number of years. Attention was called to this fact in the commission's report referred to above, and it was there stated (pp. 9 and 10):

"The increased proportion of goods entered in the gray has probably been due in part to the lower rates of duty in the present as in other acts applicable to unfinished goods. In larger part, however, it has been due to the improvement during the last decade in the finishing facilities in this country for such cloths. One advantage in importing in the gray is that the goods can be finished here as desired to meet the changing demands of the market. It is claimed in the trade that charges for finishing are as low in the United States as in England. This is in line with the facts found by the Tariff Commission as far back as 1911."

Very truly yours,

JOHN F. BETHUNE, Secretary.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 11133, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, for the purpose of considering the amendments which were passed over yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, we have not had a call of the calendar for some days. I was wondering if we could not go on with the calendar for a little while.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not believe there is going to be a great deal of discussion of the remaining items in the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if we get through with the appropriation bill before 2 o'clock, I shall ask unanimous consent to proceed with the calendar, for the consideration of unobjected bills, until that hour. If we do not and the Senator from Florida will consent now to proceed with the appropriation bill, I shall be glad to ask for an adjournment this evening so that we may have a call of the calendar to-morrow morning.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not want to stand in the way of the consideration of appropriation bills, though I am very anxious to have a call of the calendar. There is not much time before us when we can transact such business at this session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment passed over will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment passed over is on page 1, where the committee proposes to strike out after the enacting clause down to and including line 10, on page 2, and to insert:

That in order to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, 40 per cent of each of the following sums, except those herein directed to be paid otherwise, is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and all the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia, and the tax rate in effect in the fiscal year 1928 on real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia shall be continued for the fiscal year 1929, namely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a few moments, I shall be glad to make a very brief statement in regard to the amendment.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator for that purpose. I shall be glad to have the Senator make an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the bill as it comes to us from the House provides for a lump-sum contribution on the part of the Federal Government, which is not in accord with the provisions of the substantive law of 1922. Recently I made a statement on the floor of the Senate calling attention to the manner in which the progress of the District is being retarded by this departure from the law which is on the statute books. The Senate committee has given very serious consideration to this question, and has favored the amendment which is now written in the bill, which is exactly in accordance with the law as it stands on the statute books to-day. The committee added a provision that the taxation on real estate and tangible property shall be at the same rate as that being collected during the present fiscal year.

Mr. President, we feel that this is an important matter. There is no disposition on the part of the Senate committee, so far as I am aware, to attempt to reduce the rate of taxation in the city. On the other hand, the consensus of opinion is that property in the city of Washington should pay a rate of taxation equal to that exacted in any city of comparable size in the United States; but it is also the feeling that unless we go ahead on a different basis from that which we have been following under pressure for the last two or three years, the advancement, the development, and the beautification of this city are going to be seriously retarded.

If the citizens of the District of Columbia are not paying as much taxation as they should on real estate and tangible property, that fact can be ascertained through a commission to be appointed for that purpose, and the rates can be put on a fair, comparable basis. If that should result in a change in the present legal proportion of 60–40, I do not think there would be very much objection to a modification of that ratio; but at the present time we know, and I think I have conclusively shown, that the improvements and betterments which should be made in Washington at the present day are being held back by reason of a condition which has grown up here, and which the Appropriations Committee of the Senate has protested against and has never favored.

I understand the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] wishes to make some remarks on this subject.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I submit a point of order against the amendment reported by the committee which strikes out the provision of the House bill, carrying an appropriation of $9,000,000, from the Federal Treasury to meet the expenditures of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929. The amendment offered by the Senate committee provides that 40 per cent of the appropriations carried by the bill shall be met by the Federal Government out of the Federal Treasury, the remainder of the expenses to be paid out of the combined revenues of the District. The amendment also provides that the tax rate in effect during the fiscal year 1928, on real estate and tangible property, shall be continued for the fiscal year 1929. In my opinion the amendment is subject to a point of order for the reason that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill, and for the further reason that if the law is as stated by the Senator from Colorado, the proposed amendment would change the same. That the tendered amendment is legislation upon an appropriation bill can not, I think, be denied. If there is a statute which provides a division of the expenses of the District upon the basis of 40 per cent being paid out of the Federal Treasury, and 60 per cent to be met by taxes levied upon privately owned property within the District of Columbia, then that statute also provides that the property to be taxed shall not only be real estate and tangible property but intangible property.

The reported amendment, in effect, limits the taxes to be levied and collected to real estate and tangible personal property. The present tax law provides for the collection of taxes upon intangible property, and the amendment relieves intangible property from the burden of taxation. Conceding that to be true, waiving the question of the amendment constituting general legislation upon an appropriation bill, then the point of order should lie, because the existing revenue law applicable to the District is sought to be amended, and one source from which revenue is now derived by the District is absolutely destroyed.

The Presiding Officer is aware of the fact that in many jurisdictions a considerable portion of the revenue is derived from a tax upon intangible property. I am advised that intangible property taxed in the District of Columbia yields no inconsiderable sum. The word "intangible" as it is found in revenue laws has a well-understood meaning. It has been construed by many courts, and the validity of statutes levying taxes upon intangible property has been upheld. To strike down one of the pillars of the revenue system of the District, as this amendment seeks to do, is legislation. It is general legislation so far as appropriation bills are concerned. This amendment therefore seeks to graft upon an appropriation bill legislation of a general character and, as stated, to change the revenue laws of the District of Columbia.

I must respectfully insist therefore, Mr. President, that the point of order should be sustained. Before the Chair rules upon the point of order I desire to submit a few remarks with reference to the amendment. I regret having to differ from the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] in regard to the proposition under discussion, because I know that he has sincerely and earnestly addressed himself to the interests of the District and to its legislative and administrative affairs. I do not now remember any Senator since I have been in this body who has been more interested in the welfare of the District than the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. He has, with ability and impartiality, dealt with the problems incident to the government of the District as they have been brought to the attention of Congress, and I pay tribute to his fine ability and his distinguished service. However, I can not bring myself to accept his view upon the question involved in the amendment. In my opinion, the proposition that the Federal Government shall pay 40 per cent of all amounts expended for the benefit of the District of Columbia, in defraying its annual operating expenses, is not reasonable or founded upon just and rational grounds.

It is an arbitrary distribution of the burdens of the District and, so far as I have been able to discover, this division has not and can not be justified upon the theory of benefits derived or to be derived by the Federal Government and by the residents of the District of Columbia. I am not contending that a lump-sum appropriation of five millions or nine millions or fifteen millions or any other sum to be taken from the Treasury of the United States for the District purposes, is entirely rational or a permanent system which should govern the fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia. But a lump-sum appropriation is certainly as fair and as reasonable as a fractional division of the amount annually appropriated to defray the expenses of the District. Neither am I contending that the United States should not meet a portion of the expenses incurred by the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, the question is not a new one. It has been before many Congresses and, in my opinion, so far as I understand the facts, no formula has been adopted which fairly and justly meets the situation. There is much rhapsodical talk about this being the capital of the greatest nation of the world, and that as such should be the most wonderful and beautiful city in all the world. Of course, all true Americans have a deep interest in their country. They are proud of its achievements and desire that its prestige, morally and spiritually, shall not only not be diminished but shall be augmented as the years go by. I might say, however, in passing, that mighty cities and powerful states and material wealth do not mean the stability and permanence of nations. There are other forces and influences in the world, more permanent and enduring, and which must be transmuted into the life and spirit of the peoples of nations if the latter are to endure.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] has just stated that there is no disposition upon the part of the committee to relieve the people of the District of Columbia from the payment of a just and fair tax. I hope that view is shared by all people of the District. I confess, however, that I have encountered many persons who entertain the view that the Government of the United States, because of its holdings and because this is the Capital of the Republic, should meet a much larger share of the expenses of the District than it heretofore has paid. Upon the other hand, I have no doubt that a large majority of the inhabitants of the District are willing to pay what they conceive to be a fair tax to defray the expenses of the District government. The difficulty, however, is to determine what is a fair and just tax.

For many years the Federal Government contributed to the District treasury 50 per cent of the costs of operating the District government. Doubtless many persons believed that the tax levied upon their property to raise the 50 per cent was a fair and just tax. Later when a readjustment took place and the Government paid 40 per cent of the expenses of the District government, it was doubtless believed by many residents of the District that the tax imposed upon their property in order to yield the 60 per cent of the expenses of the District constituted an equitable and fair tax.

From representations made to me by estimable people who have their homes in the District and who have property herein, I am led to believe that many of the inhabitants of Washington believe that the District should pay no more than 60 per cent of the costs of the District. To exact of them a larger per cent would be regarded by those of whom I speak as unfair.

An analysis of the reasons offered in support of the proposition that the privately owned property in the District should contribute but 60 per cent of the costs of the District government, will, in my opinion, convince impartial investigators of the facts that the adoption of the 60-40 rule is not fair to the Federal Government and is unfair to the taxpayers of the United States living outside of the District of Columbia. There are many advantages enjoyed by residents of Washington denied to those residing in other parts of the Union. This is the Capital of the United States, and there come to it annually hundreds of thousands of persons from all parts of the United States and large numbers from other countries. The financial benefits accruing to the inhabitants of the District from this stream of tourists and visitors can scarcely be computed. There are tens of thousands of Government officials and Federal employees who make their homes within the District, and they expend hundreds of millions of dollars annually, substantially all of which inure directly to the financial and material advantage of the District and enhance the value of privately owned property. Moreover, the Federal Government expends enormous sums for Federal buildings.

These activities furnished employment to thousands and markets for commodities and products of the value of tens of millions of dollars. The large expenditures made by the Federal Government give added value to privately owned property. Every dollar expended by the Government for improvements and public buildings and in the execution of its duties increases the wealth of the people of Washington. An examination of the assessment rolls of the District extending over a period of 30 or 40 years emphasizes the truth of the statement just made. The assessed value of the property of the District for the year 1927 is considerably more than $1,000,000,000. Only a few decades ago the assessed value was less than $200,000,000. The expenditures of the Federal Government added to the population of the District. There are now more than 500,000 persons residing within the limits of the District of Columbia. This great increase in the population has contributed largely to the value of privately owned property within the District.

The activities of the Federal Government are constantly increasing. They will continue to increase as the years go by. The Federal Government is reaching out into new fields of endeavor. It is taking over responsibilities and duties belonging to the States, and its assumption of power and authority magnify its position, increase its machinery, and multiply the number of its officials and employees.

Its supervision and control of many business activities, its entrance into fields of endeavor heretofore regarded as exclusively within the domain of private enterprise, have resulted in bringing to Washington representatives of diversified industries from all parts of the United States, thus adding to the population and the wealth of the District. More and more people of wealth and leisure are establishing their homes in Washington. They make investments here, and the capital which they bring adds to the wealth of Washington. These accretions to the population are due to this being the Capital of the Republic and to the stupendous expenditures made by the Federal Government in the District of Columbia. Why should the General Government be penalized because it has done so much for the District and has contributed so materially to increasing the population and augmenting the wealth of those residing therein? And yet the argument is made that because the Government is doing so much for the welfare of the Capital, is constructing magnificent buildings, furnishing work to tens of thousands of people, that it should, in addition to maintaining its own property and keeping the same in repair, pay a very large proportion of the expenses incident to the execution of the functions of the municipality.

When the Federal Government erects post offices in the various cities of the United States, as well as other public buildings, and makes improvements, material benefits are derived therefrom by the residents of such cities. The people are anxious for Federal expenditures, because of the benefits locally derived therefrom. The Government constructs highways, acquires national parks and builds roads and makes improvements therein, constructs and operates navy yards and munitions plants. It builds and operates a merchant marine, maintains harbors, expends hundreds of millions of dollars for the improvement of waterways. These and many other things engage the attention of the Federal Government and result in the expending of hundreds of millions of dollars taken from the people by taxation. These expenditures and improvements and operations add to the wealth of cities and States. The people throughout the country are glad to have these improvements made, recognizing the material and financial benefits resulting therefrom. There is no thought of taxing the Government because of its activities and the property which it acquires in the execution of its duties. And yet, as I have indicated, the argument is made by some that the more the Government expends in Washington for the development of the Capital, and the more it increases the population and adds to the wealth of individuals, the less taxes they should pay and the greater the contributions to be exacted of the Federal Government to defray the expenses of the municipal government within the District. To me the argument is fallacious and utterly untenable.

I return to the question as to what is a fair tax. Resort may be had to the cities and States of our country to determine what is a fair tax. Certainly the residents of Washington should not claim advantages over other parts of the United States in the matter of taxation. I have adverted to the fact that they derive advantages not enjoyed by the inhabitants of any other city or State. Washington is one of the best governed cities in our country. The large expenditures by the General Government have added to its beauty and brought to it prestige, and I was about to say glory, not enjoyed by any other city of our country. The millions spent for magnificent buildings for the Nation add to the material as well as the moral wealth of the District.

In determining what is a fair tax, the question as to the form of the government of the District is not of controlling importance. The present governmental structure of the District is a distinct material advantage to property owners. Hundreds of residents of Washington have told me that they believe that their property was more valuable with Congress controlling the District directly and through the District Commissioners and other agencies set up than if the District were a municipality governed as other municipalities are governed throughout the Union.

The values of property within the District are regarded as protected, investments are regarded as safe and secure, there is no bonded indebtedness resting upon the District, and speaking generally the public funds raised by taxation and contributed by the Federal Government are wisely expended. Of course, it can not be said that the District Government is 100 per cent perfect. It has defects, as all human institutions have defects. There is and always will be some waste, some extravagance, some inefficiency. There are and always will be officials and employees who are incompetent and negligent in the discharge of their duties. But speaking in broad terms, I think it can be truthfully said that Washington is one of the best governed cities in all the world. These things are to be taken into account when the question of taxation is under consideration. If the people enjoy good government, if their investments are secure, if wise laws are enacted and are justly enforced, the people can afford to make liberal contributions for the maintenance of the Government that brings them such rich and inestimable fruits.

In determining whether the people of Washington are justly taxed it is quite proper to refer to the burdens of taxation resting upon the people throughout the United States. In many of the States the people, in addition to heavy property taxes, are compelled to pay taxes upon their incomes and estate and inheritance taxes. In some States there are corporation taxes which are very heavy, and in some of the mining States there is a heavy tax upon the output of the mines. In the District of Columbia there are no income taxes imposed nor inheritance or estate taxes.

Mr. SACKETT. The estate tax is fixed by Federal law. If an estate tax is not provided by the State law then the Federal law takes the whole 20 per cent.

Mr. KING. I am speaking of the District of Columbia. There is no estate or inheritance tax imposed upon the inhabitants of the District for purely District purposes. The Federal statute to which the Senator refers relates to the entire country and is imposed for the benefit of the General Government.

Mr. SACKETT. But estates in the District of Columbia have to pay the estate tax.

Mr. KING. Certainly. But the inhabitants of all States are required to pay a Federal estate tax which goes into the Federal Treasury, but in many of the States the people are required to pay not alone the Federal estate tax but local or State inheritance or estate taxes. Florida and a few other States and the District of Columbia impose no estate or inheritance taxes. As I have stated, some of the States collect income taxes and in my opinion with the growing expenses of States, counties, and municipalities, resort will be had to income and estate and inheritance taxes. The burden of taxation in the States has become oppressive. For many years substantially all of the revenue of the States and their political subdivisions was derived from property taxes. Real estate and personal property were easily found, and it was less difficult to collect taxes upon property which was visible than it was upon unseen and sometimes hidden sources of wealth, but the home owner and the man of limited means whose property was visible was always taxed, began to feel the heavy yoke of taxation, and so demands were made that the base of taxation should be broadened. Accordingly, as I have stated, other sources of revenue were sought, and now many of the States are obtaining a considerable part of their revenue from income taxes, corporation taxes, estate and inheritance taxes, and from what has been called intangible property taxes.

As stated, income taxes and estate and inheritance taxes are not imposed in the District of Columbia. I am told that many individuals have established residence in Washington who have large financial interests in other States; that the reason for having their residence in Washington is to avoid income and estate taxes which are laid in States in which they formerly lived and in which they have considerable financial interests. I do not mention this by way of complaint, but merely for the purpose of indicating that the people of the District of Columbia are not burdened by various forms of taxation laid upon the people of most of the States of the Union. An examination of the taxes paid in cities comparable with Washington in population and wealth will reveal that the inhabitants of those cities pay heavier taxes than are paid by those residing in the District of Columbia. In addition to the municipal taxes paid in the cities of the United States, most of them are required to pay county taxes and all of them State taxes, and, of course, the Federal taxes have to be met. It is not infrequent for persons to speak of the taxes of a city like Detroit or Denver or Cleveland as if the municipal taxes were the only burdens imposed upon the residents of such cities. But the fact is that in many cities the taxes for public schools are collected, not by the cities, but by school districts or by counties or by officials of the States. The municipal taxes constitute, as stated, but a fraction of the total taxes imposed upon the residents of the various cities throughout the country. In many cities the municipal taxes are 2 per cent or more and the county, State, and school taxes are as much or more. In some parts of the United States the taxes imposed amount to between 3 and 4 or 5 per cent upon a fair cash valuation of the property assessed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KING. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why should not, however, the people of the District of Columbia pay as fair a tax as the people in the cities in the States? They get as much and more. They get their parks, their museums, their libraries, and their art galleries, and all those things that make life enjoyable, and yet pay less than the people of any other city in the Union.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. I own property in the District of Columbia and I own property in two other jurisdictions, and I pay from three to four times as much outside of the District as I pay here. It is an outrage that people who have large investments in the District of Columbia insist that the people back in their States shall pay their taxes here. That is all it is. That is what is back of it all.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator that the residents of the District of Columbia should pay a fair tax upon their property for the support of the Government of the District, and in my opinion in determining what is a fair tax resort may be had to the taxes which are imposed upon the people within various cities of the United States. There is no reason why the people of the District of Columbia should not be taxed upon substantially the same basis as the residents of Detroit, Cleveland, Louisville, or other progressive cities of the United States. And when I say "taxes" upon the properties within the cities I mean, of course, all taxes, municipal, school, county, and State.

It has been my position ever since I have been in the Senate that a plan should be adopted by which a fair and just system of taxation should be put into effect in the District of Columbia. That the revenue derived from the application of that system should be devoted to defraying the expenses of the District government, and that any deficit resulting should be met by appropriations from the Federal Treasury. To illustrate. If up-to-date and progressive cities of the United States pay 4 per cent or 3 per cent upon their taxable property for city, county, school, and State purposes, then the privately owned property within the District should bear substantially the same rate of taxation, and if after collecting upon that basis from the people sufficient revenue is not obtained to meet the legitimate needs of the District then the Federal Government should appropriate whatever residue is required.

I am not in favor of naming the per cent of appropriations to be paid by the Federal Government or by the District. Nor am I in favor of fixing definitely the levy to be imposed upon the property for revenue purposes for an indefinite period. In the cities, counties, and States the rate of taxation is fixed annually or biennially. The needs of cities and States vary each year. Often the rate of taxation is diminished, measured by the preceding years' rate. The needs of Washington vary. If the needs were stationary and the value of property increased, a fixed annual rate of taxation would be improper. Manifestly the rate must change as the needs of the District change and as the value of the property within the District changes. Moreover, if an inheritance tax was levied or income taxes were resorted to for revenue purposes, the rate of taxation upon property would decrease. It is not wise or proper to have a fixed rate of taxation as so many have urged.

In my opinion, after it is determined what the needs of the District are for a given year, the commissioners, with the approval of Congress, should then fix the rate of taxation for the current year. I repeat, when I say, if after levying a fair and just tax upon the property of the District and a sufficient sum is not obtained to meet the needs of the District, then Congress should make the necessary appropriation to cover the difference. If the needs of the District should be fifty millions of dollars and the tax paid by the people under a fair system of taxation amounted to but twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars, I should vote for an appropriation from the Federal Treasury to meet the difference.

Mr. President, as I indicated earlier in my remarks, a lump-sum appropriation of five million or nine million or fifteen million dollars to be paid out of the Federal Treasury is arbitrary. It is an arrangement that is not entirely sound or logical. As I have stated, the just and rational manner of dealing with the problem is to impose a just and fair tax upon the property within the district, and then have the Federal Government pay the balance required by the District.

But I shall support the position of the House because it is fairer than the 60-40 proposition, and is no more illogical than the latter plan. A 60-40 division is wholly unsound and can not be justified in my opinion upon any logical or rational basis. An analysis of the taxes paid by the people of the United States outside of the District with those paid within the District, furnishes conclusive evidence that those within the District have less tax burdens than other citizens of the United States. A tax of $1.70 on the hundred dollars which is levied in the District is far less than that levied upon the property of the people elsewhere throughout the country. And a lump-sum appropriation of $9,000,000 is a larger contribution than the Federal Government would be required to pay if the property which it owns and uses were taxed as other property within the District is taxed. But as I have stated, the property owned by the States and municipalities is not taxed anywhere.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the excellent and able address of Mr. SIMMONS, Congressman from Nebraska, when the District appropriation bill was under consideration in the House. His address will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 21, 1928. He deals with this question in a comprehensive manner, and, in my opinion, presents a case against the 60–40 plan which can not be refuted. I ask the attention of the Senate to some of the statements made by him in his address. He refers to the $9,000,000 lump sum carried in the House bill and then states that in addition the Federal Government is contributing an additional amount for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the District. He states that the Government, in addition to the $9,000,000, contributes approximately $850,000 annually, which it would have received under the 60–40 plan; that the Government also furnishes the services of a number of officials who are employed in District activities. Mr. SIMMONS figures that the Federal Government contributes more than a million dollars to the expenses of the District over and above the million dollars provided in the lump-sum appropriation. He deals with the oft-repeated claim that the Government's holdings in the District are very large, and therefore it should pay a considerable portion of the District government's expenses. A report made by the District assessor places the value of the Government's holding at $470,000,000 and the assessed value of private property at $1,150,000,000. The value of churches and other tax-free property was placed by the assessor at $75,000,000.

But Mr. SIMMONS explains that property of the value of $157,670,000 is to be deducted from the $470,000,000 alleged to be the value of the Government property for the reason that it is used for municipal purposes. To all intents and purposes it is property belonging to the District, though the legal title is in the United States. The assesor in figuring the value of the Government property at $470,000,000, included in addition to the property estimated to be $157,670,000, used exclusively by the District, all of the squares, circles, parks, including Rock Creek and Anacostia, the Zoo and jail, and city hospital, the Red Cross and Pan American Building, the city post office, the water front, the city reservoir, the filtration plant, the city stables, the Center Market, the Industrial School for Colored Children, the police stations, the schoolhouses, the Highway Bridge, Judiciary Square, the courthouse, and other properties.

It is absurd to treat these properties as Federal property, even in the desperate attempts to find some excuse for supporting the 60–40 proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS further states that the District collects rent from the Center Market. Deducting $157,670,000, the value of the property as given by the assessor and used for municipal purposes, from the total of $470,000,000, there would remain a total value of $312,330,000 for property used largely by the Government.

This represents 18 per cent of the total District values. But if the 60–40 plan prevails, the Government would in effect be paying taxes on the entire 18 per cent of the property, though a portion of the same is used by the District and its inhabitants. If the Government should pay taxes based on $1.70 per $100 and upon the values above referred to furnished by the assessor, its tax upon the property valued at $312,330,000 would be $5,309,610.

In contributing from the Federal Treasury $9,000,000 to defray the Federal expenses of the District, it would pay substantially $4,000,000 above any tax levied upon the property so valued. Representative SIMMONS contends that if the 60–40 plan should be adopted for the next fiscal year, the United States would be required to pay $13,466,734, while the District would pay but $20,965,102 from general taxes. Of course, these figures are based upon the bill as reported by the House and upon the assumption that no more would be collected than called for by the appropriation bill, amounting to $37,059,035, as it passed the House.

I quote from the speech of Mr. SIMMONS the following paragraphs. They are exceedingly interesting and I commend them to the attention of the Senate:

> Figuring the Government values at $341,130,000, by the Federal payment carried in this bill we are charging the United States at a tax rate of $2.70, while the private holder pays a $1.70 rate. If the 60–40 plan were returned to, the private rate would be $1.20 and the United States rate would be $3.90 a hundred. What more need be said?
> Bear in mind always in this discussion that the District tax rate includes all taxes on real and tangible personal property. Or stated another way, it includes all items generally known as school district, sanitary district, city, county, and State items.
> In these calculations I have not included revenues from and expenses of the water department. It is a self-supporting activity. The board of trade in its statement has charged many things against the Federal Government. One that the city is "giving free water service" to the United States. What are the facts? I have pointed out that in fixing the value of United States property in the District there was included $19,622,441 for water reservoirs, etc., in the city system. Later on they claim to own the system and want us to pay both taxes on our system and water charges on their system. The present water system was started in 1853 and paid for and maintained entirely by the United States down to 1882. The people of Georgetown and Washington paid nothing for water save the expense of tapping the mains. Beginning in 1882 the water system was maintained out of District revenues, to which the United States contributed one-half, and the revenues of the system went into the general fund of the District. From 1917 to date the water system has been maintained out of its own revenues. The water rates are like Washington taxes—low—due to the fact that the United States bought and paid for the system, maintained it for years, and in effect gave it to the District. Other cities have paid for their own water systems. At the present time the total United States investment in the system is $11,953,700. The total District investment is $11,266,213. In other words, the water sysem is owned jointly by the United States and the District of Columbia, the Federal Government owning slightly more than one-half. In addition to that $24,753,863 from earnings have been invested in the system.
> The United States receives from the water system, of which it is half owner, 3,311,481 m. g. of water, or a return of 2.21 per cent on the investment that it has made in the plant. The District of Columbia receives 8,103,525 m. g., which makes a return of 5.75 per cent on its investment. In addition the District's return in extensions to the property brings the gross return to the District up to 7.13 per cent. Contrast the Federal return of 2.21 per cent with the District's return of 7.13 per cent, and the conclusion is reached that if anyone is receiving free water it is the District and not the United States. (See table, p. 945 of the hearings.)
> What is Washington's comparative tax rate with other cities? You will find in the hearings a table taken from the Bureau of the Census publication Financial Statistics of Cities, 1925, Washington is in the class of 500,000 or more population. That table shows the per capita levy in Washington for all purposes at $30.31, the lowest of the group. St. Louis is next, with $34.28; Baltimore, $37.58; San Francisco, for city purposes only, $42.94; Milwaukee, for city purposes only, $47.69; Philadelphia, for city purposes only, $42.81; Cleveland, $54.08; Buffalo, $55.15; New York, $55.80; Chicago, $56.08; Pittsburgh, for city purposes only, $58.15; Detroit, $57.34; Boston, $63.63. So those who want an increased Federal contribution find no aid in that table. Then, in the hearings are tables from financial statistics of cities for 1926, prepared by the Bureau of the Census.
> Those tables show that Washington is third lowest in the payment of general property taxes in cities of its population group, Washington having a per capita levy of $36.87, while Boston goes to $72.78.
> Baltimore and St. Louis have a smaller per capita levy, $34.15 and $35.05. But it must be noted that this table includes the levy for city purposes only, whereas the other cities in the group must have in addition their State and other taxes, amounting in 1925 to $4.12 for Baltimore and $1.47 for St. Louis. So that with those figures included Washington will have the lowest per capita levy in 1926 of any city in its size group save St. Louis. Likewise the general property revenues for 1926 are the lowest in Washington of any city in its class, lowest in earnings of public service enterprise and lowest in all other revenues. Likewise there are but three cities showing a lower per capita operation and maintenance cost. The committee has before it the comparative tax rates for cities for 1927, issued by the Detroit Bureau of Governmental Research. After adjusting the tax rate to a uniform 100 per cent basis of assessment and adjusting values, the final adjusted tax rate for Washington is given at $15.30 (the District assessor says it should be $16.20) per $1,000, actual value. Taking either of the two rates Washington is shown to have the lowest tax rate per actual value of property in any of the first 34 cities of the United States.

Mr. President, the fact has been stressed by some persons that the Government owns the title to the parks and to some of the public grounds surrounding the Federal buildings, and that the care of these parks and grounds is a charge upon the District. The fact is that between two and three millions of dollars are carried in other appropriation bills to care for and maintain the Federal buildings and grounds surrounding the same. And some of the parks within the District are likewise cared for by appropriations in other measures. The Federal Government contributes several millions of dollars above the appropriations carried in the District bill for the maintenance of public grounds and buildings and parks within the District of Columbia. It is not inappropriate to call attention to the fact that the parks, large and small, add to the value of the property within the District, and, of course, are an added attraction to the beauty of Washington. If there were no parks and no public grounds surrounding the Federal buildings, the value of the real estate within the District would not be as great as it now is. Central Park in New York City is exceedingly valuable. It is said that if sold for commercial purposes, it would pay the bonded indebtedness of the city of New York. No one thinks of taxing the park for municipal or State purposes. The parks within the District contribute to the happiness, health, and welfare of the people therein. They bring tourists and visitors to the city; they add to the value of privately owned property of the District.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, while the Senator is talking about that, may I show him how differently that has been decided? A jury in the District of Columbia found that the establishment of Rock Creek Park did not enhance the value of the property adjoining it one cent. That makes the Senator and me smile.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if a person tried to buy a piece of property abutting upon the park or adjoining it, he would soon discover that the park has added to the value of the property in the market.

Mr. CARAWAY. It makes a difference of about from $10 to $1,000 an acre.

Mr. KING. I regret to learn that a jury in the District of Columbia should have so far forgotten its duty as to have rendered the verdict indicated by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. President, I submit the point of order, believing that it should be sustained.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, at one time I was on the District of Columbia Committee and was familiar with its business as then transacted. I am conscious that if you want to be a "statesman"—and that moves some Senators—and get your picture in the local paper, you should say that the people back home shall pay all the taxes of the District of Columbia.

How Senators living here, with large property interests, can sit in the Senate and vote to make the people in their home States pay their taxes is something that I can not understand; and yet they do it. Senators advocating this amendment have very large interests here, and ask their people back home to pay their taxes for them. None of them would go back home and tell the people, "You are taxed four times as high as the people of the District of Columbia are taxed, and I have property in the District of Columbia, and I will vote to make you pay my taxes there in addition to paying your own back here"; and yet that is what they are doing. It is outrageous to do it, and yet they do it.

There is not a Member of the Senate who knows anything about the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia by actually owning property here and owning property in any State of this Union who does not know that he is requiring the people in the States to pay his taxes. I have property here, and I know that the rate of taxes on it is not over one-fourth the rate of taxes I am paying on property in my home town; and I think my home people are as good as the people here. I should be ashamed to want to load an additional part of the tax I pay here on them, and yet that is what this amendment seeks to do.

In addition to having the lowest tax rate, the people here have the greatest advantages. They have the parks; they have the museums; they have the art gallery; and they make the people back home buy the schoolbooks for the children in the schools here.

The people coming from States where there are public lands contend the Government ought to pay because it has certain interests here. Proportionately the Government has not one-tenth the interest here that it has in the State of Arizona, and yet there is not one of these Senators who will vote to have the Government pay 40 per cent of the taxes in the State of Arizona. They have not as much property proportionately here as they have in the State of Arkansas, and yet no Senator asked the Federal Government to pay our taxes.

In my home town one of the best blocks of land belongs to the Government, and there is on it the Government post office. We paved our streets by assessing the cost upon the adjoining owners, and we paid for paving the street in front of the Government property without cost to the Government, and put the burden upon the property owners of the State.

At one time I, together with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], had passed through the Senate an amendment to a tax bill that ought to have become law. It was killed in the House. It provided that the people of the District of Columbia should pay for what they get—a fair tax proportionately to what people pay elsewhere—and then that if there was a deficit, the Federal Government should pay that. Of course, it met with no favor on the part of the people who have been advocating the Government paying all the taxes.

I do not want to criticize the District government, because we created it; but certainly it needs reform. There is a bill pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia to give this community a city manager instead of three commissioners. Everybody knows that the three commissioners have been a failure as a governmental agency. I do not say that the gentlemen themselves are not entirely worthy men, but the form of the government has been a failure. It is the most extravagant government. I live on a street which used to be resurfaced and dug up about every other week. The other day I saw seven men doing a repair job—one man at work and six looking on.

The form of government lends itself to extravagance and inefficiency. I had hoped it would be changed, but I could not get consideration for it.

I would like to see the District get an efficient administration. I would like to see it able to try a policeman without having a riot such as is going on down here now. There ought to be some reform of the judiciary. If such a thing is possible, if the people who are holding the trial have no power to control it, the District Committee could do very much more good for the District of Columbia by reporting out some measure to give them an efficient way of trying a policeman, instead of making it a regular mob, and appealing to the crowd to overrule the court, and threatening the court.

I want the people of the District of Columbia to have a good government. I am not going to concede, as my friend over on the other side concedes, that they are entitled to any more than the people who live in the town of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAYFIELD] are entitled. They are no better.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. MAYFIELD. If I understand this proposition, it merely means an additional tax upon the people in the various States of the country.

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely; to relieve the people here from paying taxes.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Then, when we vote for this proposition, we simply vote to tax our people back home?

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely; and many of them own very large interests here, and they vote to take the tax off their own property and put it on the people in their own States. There is no use beating about the bush. That is the intention of it. It is absolutely unfair, to use the most moderate language that I know of to characterize it.

I am perfectly willing, as I said, that the District of Columbia should be treated fairly, but I have never yet been able to grow so enthusiastic over the city of Washington as to say it ought to have everything, though you strip to the bone the people in the States. The people here are no better than those in any other community. There is nothing about them that entitles them to any more than the people in any other community are entitled to receive. It is absurd to say that because they live in the District of Columbia they honor the Government by so doing, and that the Government ought to pay them to live here. That is all the amendment means.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. PHIPPS. Does the Chair have in mind a former ruling on a similar question, made by Vice President Marshall, that when the House had written into a bill a new provision it opened the door, and made it subject to any amendment which the Senate might choose to write in?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, upon investigation, finds that in the District of Columbia appropriation act approved June 29, 1922, a provision was incorporated fixing a 60–40 basis of expenditures annually for the District and Federal Governments, respectively, from and after July 1, 1922, with certain exceptions, and further authorizing a tax rate on tangible and intangible property necessary to bring the amount to be paid by the District of Columbia government up to the 60 per cent prescribed in the law.

The Chair, therefore, is of the opinion that the amendment is in line with the present law, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, on the matter of the intangible tax, the minimum rate is fixed in the substantive law of March, 1922. It is optional with the commissioners, and they have the power to increase that rate, providing they do not at any time exceed the rate fixed on real estate or tangible property. Therefore it is unnecessary to write restrictions in the amendment proposed by the Senate committee, because it is not intended to change the law. The minimum must be assessed on intangible property by the commissioners until the law is changed.

The situation with reference to real estate and tangible property is different, in that the commissioners are authorized to adopt any rate which, in their judgment, is sufficient to yield the amount of revenue necessary to provide for the conduct of affairs in the District of Columbia, taking into consideration the contribution on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, reference has been made to comparisons between the rate of taxation or the taxes actually paid by residents of the District on property and on intangibles and the amounts paid in other cities of comparable size. The attitude of the Senate Committee on Appropriations ever since 1922 has been that the properties in the District of Columbia should be assessed practically on the same basis as are the properties in similar cities. Endeavors have been made to have those comparisons properly laid before the Congress by a commission to be appointed for that purpose. The proponents of the lump-sum proposition have resisted all legislation tending to that end.

The attitude of the Senate Committee on Appropriations is that the present rate of tax should not be lowered. I think I am justified in saying it is the feeling of the committee that a commission should be appointed to determine just what would be the proper rates of taxation that would impose upon the citizens, the property owners of the District of Columbia, amounts of annual taxes equal to those paid by residents and property owners in cities similarly situated and having the same advantages.

The main objections to a lump-sum appropriation I endeavored to set forth in my remarks on the floor of the Senate last week. I do not desire to go into a lengthy discussion this morning of all the various elements entering into this question.

I do feel that the progress of the city is being retarded, and has been kept back, by the lump-sum provision, and it is well known that that was imposed against the wishes and against the protest of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, this is not a new question, by any means. It has been a controverted problem nearly ever since I have been a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge the District of Columbia appropriation bill. It has been searchingly reviewed at every session of Congress. For some years we adopted the policy of a percentage appropriation. For the last three years, I believe, we have had a lump-sum appropriation.

I have been unable to determine how anyone can defend the lump-sum appropriation for the District of Columbia. I do not know to whom the reference is made as to selfish interests in these matters. I myself do not own and never have owned a dollar's worth of property in the District of Columbia. I come from a State that pays into the Federal Treasury, in the aggregate, in direct taxes, fifteen times what is paid by the States of some gentlemen who advocate the lump-sum proposition, and the per capita taxes paid by the people of my State are in some instances five times as great as the per capita taxes paid into the Federal Treasury by some of the proponents of the lump-sum proposition.

Mr. CARAWAY. To what State does the Senator refer?

Mr. GLASS. I am referring to several States, of those who are the proponents of the lump-sum proposition. Take the State of Nebraska, for instance. The chief proponent of the lump-sum proposition in another branch of Congress comes from the State of Nebraska. It paid into the Federal Treasury $6,000,000 last year, and drew out $3,038,000 for Federal aid to its institutions. It drew out 50 per cent of the direct taxes that it paid into the Federal Treasury.

The State of Virginia paid into the Federal Treasury last year $79,000,000, and drew out an inappreciable percentage of that amount.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it the Senator's contention that the State of Virginia was not treated fairly?

Mr. GLASS. It certainly is not treated fairly when it comes to the question of proportionate burden.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it not a principle that the individual ought to pay according to his wealth? Do the citizens of Nebraska pay less, according to their wealth, than the citizens of Virginia?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; the products of Nebraska escape taxation, whereas the farm products of Virginia, notably tobacco, are taxed in a most burdensome degree as commodities, not upon income.

What I am trying to indicate is that I would be the last person in the Senate who would have any disposition in the world to increase the burden of taxes back home. I do not want the people of my State to pay any more Federal taxes than they are obliged to pay. But my contention is that the lump-sum proposition is indefensible in any event.

I do not say that 60–40 is necessarily a fair proportion of the taxes respectively to be paid by the Federal Government and by the District government. The just proportion might be arrived at if in conference we might consider all of the factors entering into the proposition; but hitherto, as is a notorious fact, we have never been permitted to consider anything. The conferees on the part of the other House have always taken their stand and have been most arbitrary in the maintenance of it, without consideration of the factors which enter into the proposition. In any event, whatever may be done, the division ought to be a percentage division. Whether it be 60–40 or 70–30 or otherwise, it ought to be a percentage division.

Now, as to the question of taxation——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am interested in the statement of the Senator that it ought to be a percentage basis. I confess I can not comprehend upon what standard one would base the taxes of the District upon that theory.

Mr. GLASS. Will the Senator please tell the Senate upon what logical basis he bases a lump-sum proposition of $9,000,000 when the total appropriation is $30,000,000, and $9,000,000 when the total appropriation is $42,000,000?

Mr. KING. I am not justifying $9,000,000, but $9,000,000 is fairer to the people of the United States than 40 per cent.

Mr. GLASS. That is the conclusion of the Senator from Utah, whereas the conclusion of other Senators who have given the matter very careful study—perhaps not so intelligent a study as the Senator from Utah has, but certainly very painstaking study—is different.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to a further interruption?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Of course, I appreciate the thrust which the Senator makes.

Mr. GLASS. No; I am not making any thrust whatsoever.

Mr. KING. But waiving that aside, because I know the characteristics of the Senator and admire them very much——

Mr. GLASS. What is the difficulty about the Senator's characteristics now?

Mr. KING. None.

Mr. GLASS. I am not referring to any characteristics of the Senator from Utah. This is purely an impersonal matter with me.

Mr. KING. I was about to observe that it seems to me if the Senator seeks a proper basis to determine the amount that should be paid, it should be this: Assess the property of the District of Columbia at a fair valuation. Then if there is any residue, if there is any deficit, I am perfectly willing the Government should pay it, whether it is $1,000,000 or $15,000,000. But I do insist that the property of the District of Columbia shall be fairly taxed; and then, because the Government is here and we have some property here, I am willing that the Government shall then pay a reasonable sum to make up the deficit; but let us tax the property of the District fairly, as we tax property in Wyoming, Virginia, and other States.

Mr. GLASS. To all that I agree. To all that I have always agreed. If the Senator, who is a member of the subcommittee, would just help us determine what is a fair assessment in the District, I would yield to his judgment in the matter. The statement has been made over and over again before our committee, and uncontradicted by any responsible person so far as I recall, that the assessment in the District of Columbia is ample and is fair. Now, if it is not ample, if it is not fair, I, as a member of the District Committee, desire to have it made so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. What is the rate of taxation per $100 in Lynchburg, the city in which the Senator lives?

Mr. GLASS. We have a variety of taxes there. The State of Virginia no longer imposes a tax upon real estate, if I recall. I have been away from Lynchburg many years, and I do not keep as well posted on matters there as perhaps I should.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am talking about the entire tax, State, county, and municipality.

Mr. GLASS. I think the tax in my town is $1.50.

Mr. CARAWAY. That covers State, county, and municipality?

Mr. GLASS. I think so.

Mr. CARAWAY. On the full 100 per cent valuation?

Mr. GLASS. The State of Virginia no longer levies any taxes on real estate at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. From what source does it get its tax money?

Mr. GLASS. From corporations and intangible property, and a variety of other sources, such as licenses and things of that sort. It segregates real estate for the purposes of local taxation.

Mr. CARAWAY. When we add the other items, we can get some idea of how much it paid. Suppose the Senator's property is worth $10,000 and he pays every kind of taxes, what would he pay?

Mr. GLASS. I do not keep up with those matters, though I am a taxpayer to a moderate extent in Virginia. If the Senator will permit me to say so without offense, I do not think that those details are pertinent here, for the simple reason that I stand upon the ground that if the property of the District of Columbia is not amply assessed, it should be. If anybody will come before the District Committee and convince me that it is not fully assessed, I will vote to increase the assessment. If anybody will come before the committee and convince me that the $1.70 proposed in the pending bill is not a fair tax, is not comparable to the taxes paid throughout the country in cities of like size and population, I will vote to increase the tax rate.

My simple contention is that whatever shall be the respective burdens of the Federal Government and of the District government, it should be upon a fair percentage basis and not upon an inexorable lump-sum proposition that applies to a total taxation of $30,000,000 for one year and applies just as precisely in the same way to a total taxation of $42,000,000 in another year.

This has been an exceedingly intricate and difficult problem to determine for the reason that I alluded to a while ago. The conferees on the part of the House have never been willing to discuss the details. They have never been willing to arrive at an ample assessment if the existing assessment is deficient. We have never been able to determine the proper rate of taxation if the existing rate is not ample. They have come into the conference room set upon their particular view of the subject, have been offensive to their colleagues on the part of the Senate, and have not been willing to discuss matters, as any member of the Senate committee will testify.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it is natural for us to differ on all matters relating to taxation, but as I view the situation here it is entirely different from the situation as regards any other city in the country. I think we have to choose between two possible solutions of the pending problem. On the one hand, the Federal Government must share with the District, carrying the sorrows and the joys and the expense of government. In that case we can justify our supervision of the expenditures of the District. On the other hand, if we fix a lump sum as a charge against the District, we have no moral right then to determine how the money in excess of that sum shall be expended.

We have chosen as a government to take possession of the seat of government. I think the debates in the Constitutional Convention and the history of events leading up to the decision of the convention are most interesting. They have a bearing upon the problem.

It will be recalled that the Congress met in Philadelphia, and at one time, driven by the uncomfortable feeling in the Army, the feeling on the part of the troops that they were not decently paid and not promptly paid, they streamed into Congress in Philadelphia and demanded that "justice" should be done. The Congress called upon the authorities of Philadelphia to restrain those men. Congress had no consideration from the authorities and as a result adjourned and left Philadelphia. They went over to Trenton, N. J., and went on with their work there. Many of the men who were in that Congress were members of the Constitutional Convention of 1787. Recalling their uncomfortable experience, they determined that the seat of government should be in a place over which the Government itself had full direction and power.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I dislike to correct the Senator, but the question of the seat of government was fixed very much later, in a compromise between Mr. Jefferson and——

Mr. COPELAND. I am not speaking about this seat of government, the District. It was determined by the Constitutional Convention that wherever the seat of government was full authority should be had over that place, just exactly as the Government has authority over a fort. As a result of that decision, at a later time, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, this particular site was chosen. But in the founding of government we decided to have authority over the seat of government, and it is right that we should have.

While I differ often with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] about matters of policy, I think he and I are in full agreement as regards the question of whether the people in the District of Columbia should vote. I think the Government should continue to have full authority over the District. So long as we have it and exercise it, if we are to assume control of the fiscal affairs of the community, we must be fair with the people. To this end there must be some stated division of the costs; otherwise there can be a suspicion of unfairness. It would not be right at all, as I see it, to establish $9,000,000 or any other sum as the sum which the Government should contribute and then say, "In addition to that we are going to tell you how to spend your own money." We deprive the people of the District the right to determine for themselves how they shall be treated, and therefore we must be very sure that we are dealing fairly with them in all matters, particularly of taxation.

This city differs from any other American city because it is "our city." I speak with just as much pride of "my city of Washington" as I speak of "my city of New York." Every citizen of the country takes pride in the National Capital. Consequently, every citizen of the United States wants this to be a model place.

Is it a model place? It is not. We ought to spend more money here than we are spending. As I see it, we ought to make it a model in every respect, with model streets, model parks, model lighting, model schoolhouses, modern illumination and ventilation in our schoolhouses. We ought in every way that we can to make this a place to be held up to every other community in the United States and have it said, "That is the kind of city this country believes in. Let us imitate and emulate the example of Washington."

I do not believe for myself that the taxpayers in my State are going to find any fault with me because I advocate fairness in the payment by the Government of its full share of the taxes of this community.

Because of our power to do it, we have chosen to withdraw from taxation many blocks of valuable property. The wonderful improvements about to be made on the Mall—and we are proud of them—will take from the tax rolls blocks and blocks of property now paying taxes. This is an added reason why it is right that the Federal Government should increase its contribution.

I am not here to say whether 60–40 is a fair proportion; that is the one I voted for because it is the one which I understand was fixed by law; but I think that there must be such a fixed division as to show a real partnership. Otherwise we are immoral when, as a Congress, we seek to determine what expenditures shall be made in the District of Columbia.

Just one further word, Mr. President. I think any American who has traveled extensively over the world has had occasion to be ashamed of the appearance of our establishments in foreign countries. I was proud and happy to cast my vote for the expenditure of money so that there should be an improvement in the appearance of those buildings and in the housing of our officials abroad. In exactly the same spirit, I am glad to give my vote for the committee amendment. Even though it may cost the people of my State a lot of money, I am pleased to do it, because my constituents desire to see the city of Washington made the model, outstanding, beautiful city which it should be and which every American wants it to be.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, of course, there are some Senators who can satisfy their sense of justice by saying that everybody is proud of the District of Columbia. Some way or another, I have just as much pride in the humblest home of any citizen in my State as I have in the most magnificent palace in the District of Columbia. I have never been willing to say that I would thrust my hand into the pockets of the people of the States in order to establish somewhere a more beautiful place than they themselves can enjoy. Neither have I been ashamed of the way in which the representatives of this Government were housed abroad; that has never humiliated me. I have been more ashamed sometimes when the people who have borne the heat and burden of making this country what it is have been denied justice here at home. That is the thing that has worried me.

I am not the keeper of anybody's else sense of what is right or wrong. I am unable, however, to reconcile my own convictions to the suggestion that we ought to thrust the taxing hand of the Government into the pockets of the people of the States in order to beautify Washington. Of course, if that is wrong, then I am wrong.

For anybody who ever studied the situation a minute to say that the District of Columbia is paying as much taxes as people similarly situated in other cities is to deny a common intelligence. Much as I dislike to disagree with those who make that assertion, I know that they have not given the question any consideration at all, or they would know they are wrong. There is possibly some property here that is paying too much; I do not know. The assessor for the District of Columbia went around all last summer making a guess on what this building was worth, what the Treasury was worth, what the White House was worth, while there is property right within a block the assessment of which he has not changed in 25 years.

The thing I am complaining about, Mr. President, is not that the Government should pay something. I want the people of the District to pay a fair tax, and then the remainder of the necessary expenditures may be paid by the Government; but I am not willing with my friend from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to say that we ought to take off all the reins and pour out money so long as anybody may cry out for it.

The people in the District of Columbia are no better than the people who live in the humblest hamlet in California or in the city of New York. After all the question of morality raised by the Senator from New York is this: Shall we as the arbiters between other communities and the District take from them to give to the District? There is where the immorality lies.

I feel rather strongly on this subject, Mr. President, because I know and everybody else knows of the constant propaganda on this question that goes on here. We have seen Senators change their viewpoint on the subject in order to escape that propaganda, and some change their viewpoint for other reasons. I know that there is more justice in saying that the Government shall pay so much as a lump sum and then let the community determine the expenditures and pay what it will, than to say the District can make the expenditures what they will and the Government shall pay 40 per cent of them. Anybody can see the question of immorality or good sense, either one, that is involved. Of course, I realize that some Senators here would be perfectly willing to go into the Treasury and pay 100 per cent, and, in addition, pay the people of the District a bonus, and they would be called by them statesmen.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are detained from the Senate because of attendance on the funeral of the late Senator WILLIS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, in the consideration of this item in the District of Columbia appropriation bill it is not my purpose to prolong the debate but to call attention to a few pertinent facts which, in my opinion, ought to be controlling, and which constitute sufficient grounds for a vote against the committee amendment.

Of course, it is understood that the lump-sum appropriation heretofore made under the District of Columbia appropriation bill was $9,000,000. Under the proposed committee amendment, by adopting the ratio of 60–40—that is, the taxpayers of the District of Columbia paying 60 per cent of the appropriation and the people of the United States paying 40 per cent of the appropriation—it results as follows, as shown by a schedule inserted in the RECORD during the consideration of the bill in the House of Representatives:

The total appropriation, after adding deficiency and supplemental appropriations for 1928, estimated, is $34,664,281, of which it is proposed that the people of the United States shall pay $13,865,712, or $4,865,712 more than they have been paying toward the government of the District of Columbia. That, in effect, is an increase of over 50 per cent. Under the proposed amendment the tax rate upon an assessment of $1,000 would be only $1.20.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senate amendment provides that the rate of taxation shall not be reduced. There would be an accumulation of funds, necessarily, which is now required to make up the deficiencies of former years when we have failed to advance at a proper rate in the erection of school buildings, in the acquisition of park lands, and other activities of the District. The Senator will find printed in the RECORD a list made up by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia showing a program that will require, in round figures, $52,000,000, which is in fact now delinquent, representing activities that should be carried on immediately, plus an additional $29,000,000 that is considered desirable, and therefore recommended.

Mr. BLAINE. And what is the present tax rate, may I inquire?

Mr. PHIPPS. The present tax rate on real estate and tangible property is 1.7 per cent, $1.70 on the $100, on full valuation; and the best estimates obtainable indicate that the real estate is assessed up to within 96 per cent of full valuation. Of course, in some cases the full valuation may not be put on it. In other cases it is assessed above the price at which it would sell on the market to-day.

In that connection, going into the question of comparisons in order to determine whether or not taxation in the District of Columbia is as high as it is in other cities of comparable size, it is necessary to consider not only the tax rate but the basis of assessment, because it is found that that will vary from 40 per cent to perhaps 75 per cent. It is rarely indeed that you will find any community where the real estate is assessed at as near full valuation as in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it is very clear that there is a difference of opinion with respect to what the facts are. My information does not lead me to the conclusion that the District tax rate is $1.70, and I shall go into that before I conclude my remarks; but the effect of this amendment is to impose upon the people of the United States 40 per cent of the appropriations made for the government of the District of Columbia, or an increase of over 50 per cent, notwithstanding the remarks of the Senator from Colorado.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], whose opinion I very much respect, has suggested that there is no justification for a lump-sum appropriation. Again I submit that there are few facts upon which to base opinions in connection with this matter. I submit that there is just as much justification for a lump-sum appropriation as there is for a percentage appropriation.

It has been charged on the floor this morning that those who administer the appropriations made in the District are extravagant. Whether that is true or not is not essential to be established in connection with my remarks. It is pertinent, however, to call attention to the fact that when a percentage of an appropriation comes out of the Public Treasury of the United States, regardless of the maximum that that percentage may produce in funds, those who administer the appropriations to the District are encouraged toward extravagance.

In other words, when the taxpayers of this District pay only 60 per cent of the expenses of the District, and the people of this country pay 40 per cent, there is no inducement on the part of the commissioners who administer the appropriation to administer it economically, because the Federal Government is making up the deficiency. All the taxpayers of the United States are paying this added $4,500,000, and you are simply pouring that amount into the laps of the commissioners, and they can expend it and the maximum of it for the purposes specified in the bill; and of course any system of that kind is bound to promote extravagance. It is not their money. It is not the money levied as taxation upon the people of this District. It is money that the Treasury of the United States pours into the lap of the District, to be expended within the limitations of the bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. I did not hear the criticism on extravagance of expenditures in the District to which the Senator refers. Perhaps my attention was diverted at the moment; but I believe beyond question, and I have made an intimate study of the operations in this District during the nine years I have been a Member of this body, that no city in the United States is more efficiently and economically administered; no municipal government is better than that of the District of Columbia. After the Senator has been with us a few years, and been in contact with the Budget system, and become acquainted with the commissioners and the men who administer affairs in this District, his mind will be disabused of the thought that there is carelessness or extravagance in management. Quite the reverse is the fact. Every item of expenditure must be accounted for. There is never any suspicion of graft. Purchases are made in the most systematic and careful manner. Everything is checked by the Budget. Not only that but it is again checked by the Appropriations Committee of the House and by the Appropriations Committee of the Senate before the appropriation is made, and no appropriation may be exceeded, because the money is not available for the purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator evidently missed the purport of my remarks. I did not charge that there was extravagance.

Mr. PHIPPS. I did not so understand the Senator. I said I missed the remarks to which he referred.

Mr. BLAINE. I suggested that there was a charge on the floor this morning with respect to extravagance, made by the Senator across the aisle from the Senator from Colorado, and only a few feet from him. I am not indorsing that charge or making it. I am saying, however, that extravagance will be promoted where a percentage of total cost is poured into the laps of those who are to administer the appropriation.

Moreover, the people of the District of Columbia, as has been asserted, pay no income taxes into the District funds and pay no inheritance taxes into the District funds. In many of the States of the Union inheritance taxes are collected and income taxes are collected, State inheritance and State income taxes, which the people of the District of Columbia escape.

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that there was compiled by the Detroit Bureau of Governmental Research from data furnished by members of the governmental research conference, city officials, and chambers of commerce, a table with respect to the question of the rate of taxation as it affects the larger cities of the United States. That table is inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 21 of this year, found on pages 3369 and 3370.

I have been unable to discover in the record any showing that this table is incorrect. The table was not made up for the purpose of convicting the District of Columbia of having a low tax rate. It was made up for the purpose of determining the general rates of taxation in cities throughout the United States, and was a disinterested study, so far as this District was concerned. It had no other purpose than to ascertain the facts, and it is shown by that schedule that, taking the actual assessment upon realty and upon personal property, taking the amounts paid for city, school, county, and State taxes, and readjusting the actual assessment to a uniform 100 per cent basis of assessment, which works out mathematically absolutely correct, the District of Columbia has a tax rate of $1.53, or $15.30 per $1,000 assessment.

The city of Milwaukee, in my own State, upon the same basis, has a tax rate of $24.48. The city of Buffalo, N. Y., has a tax rate of $18.70. That is per $1,000 of assessed valuation, after the readjustment. The rate for the city of New York is $19.15; Chicago, $23.23; Philadelphia, $23.85; Detroit, $21.71; Los Angeles, $20.30; Cleveland, Ohio, $19.28; St. Louis, $19.35; Baltimore, $21.31; Boston, $30; Pittsburgh, $30.46; San Francisco, $18.30.

Of 14 cities, with a population of from 500,000 and upward, the city of Washington, or the District of Columbia, has by far the lowest tax rate upon the adjusted basis. Of cities with a population of from 300,000 to 500,000, there are eight set forth in the schedule, all of them with a higher tax rate upon the same adjustment than the District of Columbia, and none of those eight cities has a lower tax rate than $19.03, running as high as $37.90.

Of cities with a population of 100,000 to 300,000 there are 40 listed, and Washington, or the District of Columbia, has a tax rate lower than any of those 40 cities except 2. Those 2 are Birmingham, Ala., with a rate of $12.96, and Dallas, Tex., with a rate of $13.04. All the others, 38 of them, have a higher tax rate than the city of Washington.

If there is any error in this table, I can not find that it has been pointed out in the discussion in the House, nor has there been information on the floor of the Senate that would lead one to a conclusion that this table is in error.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. Can the Senator inform us how this table was compiled, other than that it was gotten up by the Detroit bureau? Does he know whether or not that bureau got the actual information, or simply took the estimates of the various treasurers or assessors of these different cities that their property valuations were in accordance with the law based upon assessments of 75 per cent, or 60 per cent, or some other figure?

The difficulty is in getting at an actual situation. This table states that property in Washington is assessed at 90 per cent. Our assessor would report that it is assessed at 100 per cent. The best information I have been able to get is that it is assessed at approximately 96 per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me suggest now that if the local assessor claims the assessment at 100 per cent, the actual value, I can not subscribe to that statement.

Mr. PHIPPS. He is supposed to. That is the law.

Mr. BLAINE. I challenge the Senator and I challenge the assessor to go out and buy a single tract of real estate in the city of Washington at the assessed valuation. There is no tract that you can purchase at any such rate at all.

Mr. PHIPPS. As a general statement, the Senator is quite correct, but there are instances where the property is assessed at more than its recent selling price. I had an instance in my own experience, where I acquired a piece of property to round out my residence property, and I returned for the purpose of assessment the actual money consideration in the purchase of that property. The assessor would not accept that. In other words, he had valued it himself and put it at a higher figure, and when his attention was called to the actual purchase price for that property he said, "We must make this comparable with the valuation of adjoining property." With that statement I acquiesced and said, "Very well, then, I will pay taxes on a valuation higher than what I really paid for this piece of real estate." That is the fact.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, of course there may be an isolated case, such as the Senator suggests, and we could call in citizens from throughout the District and find other cases of that kind. But go out and try to buy property in this District at the assessed valuation, and I dare say it would take you the rest of your lifetime before you would find anybody who was willing to sell at less than the assessed valuation, unless, perchance, in the case of the Senator from Colorado, of course.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the District officials have been acquiring property for school sites, for playgrounds, and for other purposes right along, and in many instances they have acquired property at less than the assessed valuation. The Senator can assure himself of that by making inquiry at the District Building.

Mr. BLAINE. But in the completion of the Mall the Senator knows, and we all know, that the Government is going to pay a largely increased price over the assessed valuation for the aggregate property within the area proposed to be taken over. If the southwest location is purchased for the market, the District of Columbia or the Federal Government, whichever purchases the property, will find itself exactly in the same situation. I know here and there is a tract, a lot, that is assessed too high; there is no doubt about that; but that does not represent the average assessment in the city of Washington. I submit, Mr. President, that this table as presented in the House is a fair representation of the facts as it relates to the several cities in the United States included within the table.

Moreover, Mr. President, the Federal Government has purchased and is maintaining magnificent parks about the city, public libraries about the city, and other public improvements here, generally enjoyed by the citizens of Washington, for which they do not pay one cent. Perhaps they should not pay for any of those enjoyments, but I want to say that they are enjoyments which are not afforded to very many people in the United States.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to state that the upkeep of the public libraries and the parks was taken care of by the Federal Government and not the citizens of the District?

Mr. BLAINE. I say that the Federal Government has magnificent parks within the District of Columbia, has magnificent public libraries within the District of Columbia, and museums, to which the District does not contribute one cent, and I point out, if you please, and submit to the Senator from Colorado the Congressional Library.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, of course the Congressional Library is a Federal institution; but the Senator will find items right in this appropriation bill for the public libraries and the parks here, appropriations for their upkeep, for salaries, and everything else.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senator does not deny the statement I made that there are public parks and these other advantages to which the people of the District of Columbia contribute nothing, so far as general property taxes are concerned.

Mr. PHIPPS. There are no parks I know of at the moment that are not maintained by the District of Columbia. The District of Columbia to-day is paying for the reclaiming of land in the Anacostia flats, recovering the Anacostia flats to make additional parks.

Mr. BLAINE. I am afraid the Senator is a little technical in his definition of a park. He and I are thinking about different things. The Mall, of course, will not be called a park, but in all essential features it is going to be a public recreation ground, and in all essential features will be a park. I refer to those public improvements and public acquisitions by the Federal Government.

Moreover, there is a distinct advantage, social and commercial, enjoyed by the people who live within the District of Columbia. I do not believe there is another community in the United States, indeed, in this whole world of ours, where the same opportunities are afforded. I do not believe, however, that the people of the District of Columbia should be specially taxed for those things.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, Senate bill 3555, the farm relief bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I understood from the Senator in charge of the unfinished business that it would be agreeable to him to have it laid aside temporarily in order that we may complete the consideration of the District appropriation bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I would like to inquire how long "temporarily" means? Is it during the day or just for an hour or two, or how long?

Mr. PHIPPS. I had hoped we would reach a vote on the pending amendment and conclude the consideration of the bill itself by this hour. I do not know that it will require very much longer. I know of only one other Senator who intends to speak on the pending amendment, which is the only matter really in controversy. I am informed that one or two Senators, who had intended to speak on the farm relief bill this afternoon, are indifferent as to whether they shall speak this afternoon or to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, and the Senate resume the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] will proceed.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I appreciate that Congress has a certain responsibility to the District of Columbia; in fact, a very special responsibility. This city is the seat of our Government. It is the pride of the people of the United States. We are anxious to advance the beauty of this community, to preserve it, to make it a model city. I am sure, as I observed, that there is no Member of this body who desires to do the unfair thing toward the people living within the District of Columbia. No one has been able to state whether $9,000,000 as a lump sum is the proper amount. No one has been able to state with any degree of accuracy or with any confidence in his statement that the Federal Government should contribute 40 per cent toward the expenses of the District of Columbia. The fact is that we are without specific facts and information upon the question. However, the absence of those facts does not, in my opinion, justify an increase of the appropriation, as I have pointed out, over 50 per cent and the placing of that additional burden upon the people of the United States. While we do hold in our hands a trust to be administered in the interests of the District of Columbia, because this is the seat of government, in no less measure do we hold in our hands a trust to be administered in the interest of the people of the whole of the United States.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss particularly the amendment now before the Senate, but I would like to call attention to an injustice being done to some citizens of the District of Columbia. I know, for instance, of a little community within the District called Hillcrest, where there are about 200 homes and a nice school, but without any facilities whatever for the children or the teachers. Each teacher is required to teach three or four different grades. There are no sidewalks, no sewers, no lights. They are just left out there without any of the conveniences of the present day and time at all.

It does seem to me that when the Commissioners of the District come to Congress asking for more money and asking the Federal Government to pay a very large part of that money, they should pay some attention to those parts of the District which have been so long neglected and have not been given the ordinary, decent accommodations which are given to almost all communities.

I thoroughly agree with the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] that this is our capital. It is just as much my city as it is anyone else's, as he well said. I want to see it made a beautiful city. I want to see the most beautiful city in the world for the United States Capital, because when people come here from other countries I like to be in a position to show them something a little better than they have at home.

I do not think it is right to ask for a proposition of this kind to benefit only a few of the people. The worst part of it is that it benefits the people who are able to take care of themselves, while the others are not. They have not the money. They have their little humble homes, their little schools; they are fighting along the best they can to take care of their families and rear their children properly and give them an education, and yet when those children go to school they have to walk in the mud. When the ladies go out anywhere, to call on each other, to attend church, or anything of the sort, they have to tramp through the mud. The health of the community is not properly protected because they have not the facilities that are given to the ordinary people of this day.

I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senate and the District Committee to the fact that they are endangering the health of these little children.

We passed a resolution here yesterday to have May 1 set aside as children's health day, and yet here, almost within the sound of a bugle call from the Capitol, where we make these heavy appropriations, we are letting children be subjected to the worst kind of treatment for the want of proper consideration by those in authority. I simply desired to call this matter to the attention of the District Commissioners and of the Senate, and to state that so far as I am concerned, unless this money is more equitably divided, unless the District Commissioners and the District Committees of the House and Senate pay more attention to outlying districts and do not give all the money to people who are able to have their own systems of sewerage, and so forth, hereafter I shall not vote to support any such appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the Senate Chamber to attend a committee meeting, and I want to be sure that I understand the amendment to the house of detention item. I understand that the amendment, if agreed to in the Senate, will then go to conference and, before having been finally decided upon, there will be a hearing held upon those items. Am I correct in my understanding?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is proposed to have a hearing by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, not by the conferees. The subcommittee desires to inform itself further and fully regarding the matter and everything included in it, so that it may be in a position to present a very clear case to the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. That will be done before the conference is held?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. With that understanding, I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. Several Senators left the Chamber, not expecting that the vote would come quite so soon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 58, line 7, where the committee proposes to strike out the words "of children under 17 years of age, and, in the discretion of the commissioners."

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, let me say for the information of the Senate that the only amendments remaining, being those passed over last night, relate to the house of detention and the proposed receiving home for children. I have previously made a short statement to the effect that it is the intention of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations to obtain some further information which will put that committee in proper position to place the entire question before the Representatives of the House. The provisions are now written into the bill by the Senate amendments put the bill in such position that whatever is decided upon as the wise and proper thing may be properly cared for by adjustment in conference; and, of course, at the moment I feel confident that the amendments as written in the bill by the Senate committee are right and proper and should be agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PHIPPS. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I understand the amendments, I am in accord with the position just taken by the chairman of the committee. Those amendments have for their object the separation of the detention home from the police, either policemen or policewomen, and placing the juveniles who may be arrested not under the control of policewomen or policemen but in a separate place, where they can be properly cared for. That is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct.

Mr. KING. With that understanding, I hope the amendments offered by the committee will be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 58, line 16, where it is proposed to strike out "$14,000" and insert "$8,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Also, in line 17, strike out "$15,780; in all, $29,780" and insert "$6,480; in all, $14,480."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. The next amendment passed over is on page 73.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 73, after line 20, insert:

For the maintenance, under the jurisdiction of the Board of Public Welfare, of a suitable place for the reception and detention of children under 17 years of age arrested by the police on charge of offense against any laws in force in the District of Columbia, or committed to the guardianship of the board, or held as witnesses, or held temporarily, or pending hearing, or otherwise, including transportation, purchase of one passenger-carrying motor vehicle at a cost not to exceed $750, operation and maintenance of motor vehicles, food, clothing, medicine and medical supplies, rental and repair and upkeep of buildings, fuel, gas, electricity, ice, supplies and equipment, and other necessary expenses, including personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $25,000, to be immediately available: Provided, That such portion as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may determine of the appropriation of $25,000 for rent, under the heading "Contingent and miscellaneous expenses, District of Columbia," contained in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, shall be available for the purposes of this paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 84, line 6, strike out "$24,600" and insert "$21,600."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, beginning where we left off the other day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The first business on the calendar under the unanimous-consent agreement was the bill (S. 3178) to provide an additional method for collecting taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That whenever any real estate in the District of Columbia has been or shall hereafter be sold for nonpayment of taxes or assessments of any kind whatsoever and shall have been bought in by the District of Columbia, and more than two years shall have elapsed since such bidding in, and the same has not been redeemed in the manner and on the terms provided by law, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, in the name of and on behalf of the District of Columbia, apply to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, sitting in equity, for the purpose of enforcing such tax lien by the said District of Columbia on the aforesaid property; and up to the time of the sale hereinafter provided for, such property may be redeemed by the owner thereof by the payment of the taxes and all legal penalties and costs thereon and such other costs as the court may deem proper.

Upon the proof in such suit of the failure of the owner or owners of the property to redeem it as provided by law, the court shall, without unreasonable delay decree the sale of said property to satisfy the taxes, assessments, penalties, costs, and interest due the District of Columbia and the costs of the suit, and said sale shall be by the collector of taxes or his deputy, at public auction in front of said premises after advertisement of said sale for 10 consecutive days in some daily newspaper of general circulation published in the District of Columbia: Provided, That if it shall appear that there were substantial defects in any tax sale, no part of the penalties and charges incidental to such sales shall be collectible. All persons interested in the property or entitled to redeem from such tax sale shall be made parties thereto, and the proceeds from such judicial sale shall be applicable to the payment of the aggregate taxes, penalties, costs, including costs of such public advertising and sale, and interest due to the District of Columbia and the payment of costs of such suit. In no such case shall there be any allowance by the court for attorneys' fees or trustees' commission.

No sale shall be made, unless by express order of the court, for an amount less than such aggregate taxes, interest, and costs of suit, including advertising and sale. Any surplus received from such sale over said amounts shall be paid by the collector of taxes into court to abide its further order for payment to the person or persons in equity entitled to receive it, if they shall be known. On confirmation of the sale by the court, the court shall cause to be issued to the purchaser, when he shall have paid the purchase money and complied with the terms of sale, a deed to be executed by the clerk of the court which shall have the effect to convey to the purchaser all the right, title, and estate of all parties defendant, whether proceeded against as known or unknown.

Publication may be substituted for personal service upon any defendants not personally served by the marshal, whether known or unknown, by advertisement in some daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia at least once a week for three successive weeks, the first of such advertisements to appear at least three weeks before any petition shall be filed, and such cost of publication shall be lawful charges and be included in the costs of suit.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 28) consenting that certain States may sue the United States, and providing for trial on the merits in any suit brought hereunder by a State to recover direct taxes alleged to have been illegally collected by the United States during the years 1866, 1867, and 1868, and vesting the right in each State to sue in its own name, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there will be some discussion on that joint resolution. There is some information that I have asked for which I have not obtained. I ask that it be passed over temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

LEGAL PROCEEDINGS IN TERRITORY OF ALASKA

The bill (H. R. 328) to relieve the Territory of Alaska from the necessity of filing bonds or security in legal proceedings in which such Territory is interested was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 173) expressing it as the sense of the Senate that Andrew W. Mellon should resign as Secretary of the Treasury was announced as next in order.

Mr. METCALF. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CODE

The bill (S. 2366) to amend subchapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia relating to degree-conferring institutions was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 10, after the word "this," to strike out "act" and insert "subchapter"; on page 2, line 3, after the word "Columbia," to strike out "nor shall" and insert "or"; in line 5, after the word "otherwise," to insert "undertaking to"; and in the same line, after the word "degree," to insert "operate," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That subchapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia be amended by adding the following new sections:

"SEC. 586a. The fee payable to the recorder of deeds for filing the certificate of incorporation under this subchapter shall be $25.

"SEC. 586b. No institution heretofore or hereafter incorporated under the provisions of this subchapter shall have the power to confer any degree in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, nor shall any institution incorporated outside of the District of Columbia or any person or persons individually or as a partnership or association or otherwise, undertaking to confer any degree, operate in the District of Columbia, unless under and by virtue of a license from the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, which before granting any such license may require satisfactory evidence—

"1. That in the case of an individual or any unincorporated group of individuals be, or a majority of them, or in the case of an incorporated institution, a majority of the trustees, directors, or managers of said institution are persons of good repute and qualified to conduct an institution of learning."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee if this bill now is substantially in the form in which it was when the committee considered it?

Mr. CAPPER. At a meeting of the committee yesterday I was directed to ask that the amendment proposed on page 2, striking out section 2, lines 15 to 18, and substituting another section, be rejected, and that the bill remain in the form originally introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment referred to will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 14, to strike out:

2. That any such degree shall be awarded only after such period of residence and such quantity and character of work as is usually required by reputable institutions awarding such degrees.

And to insert:

2. That any such degree shall be awarded only after such quantity and quality of work shall have been pursued as is usually required by reputable institutions awarding such degrees: And provided further, That if more than one-half of the requirement for any such degree shall have been earned by correspondence or extramural study, such fact shall be conspicuously noted on the diploma conferred.

Mr. CAPPER. I ask that that amendment be rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 6, after the words "provisions of," to insert "this"; and in the same line, after the word "subchapter," to strike out "1 of this act," so as to read:

3. That applicants for said degree possess the usual high-school qualifications at the time of their candidacy therefor.

4. That considering the number and character of the courses offered, the faculty is of reasonable number and properly qualified, and that the institution is possessed of suitable classroom, laboratory, and library equipment.

SEC. 586c. Application for the license referred to in the preceding section shall be in writing upon forms prepared under the direction of the Board of Education, and shall be filed with the secretary of the said board, whose duty it shall be, in case the institution so licensed is incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia, to forward a copy of said license to the recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, who shall indorse upon the certificate of incorporation the fact that said license has been issued. The Board of Education is hereby authorized to employ the personnel of the public-school system of the District of Columbia, so far as the same may be necessary, for the proper performance of its duties under this act, and it shall be the duty of all public officers and bureaus of the Federal Government concerned with educational matters to render such advice and assistance to the Board of Education as it may from time to time consider necessary or desirable for the better performance of its duties under this act.

SEC. 586d. A license once issued may be revoked by said Board of Education for noncompliance on the part of any individual or individuals, association, or incorporated institution so licensed with the provisions of section 586b of this act. Upon the revocation of any such license it shall be the duty of the secretary of the Board of Education, in the case of an institution incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia, to forward a copy of the revocation to the recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, who shall cause a notation to be placed upon the certificate of incorporation to the effect that its authority to confer degrees has been revoked: Provided, however, That 30 days' notice shall first have been given to such individual or individuals, association, or to the trustees, directors, or managers of said institutions, with full opportunity to be heard by said Board of Education at either a public or nonpublic session thereof, as may be desired by such individual or individuals, association, or the institution threatened with revocation of its license, and the evidence upon which said board shall act in the revocation of such license shall be committed to writing under the direction of the board, and upon application therefor a copy thereof furnished to such individual or individuals, association, or the institution whose license has been revoked: And provided further, That any party aggrieved by the action of said board in refusing to license or in revoking a license previously granted may have the action of the said Board of Education reviewed by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia at an equity term thereof.

SEC. 586e. No institution incorporated under the provisions of this subchapter shall use as its title, in whole or in part, the words United States, Federal, American, national, or civil service, or any other words which might reasonably imply an official connection with the Government of the United States, or any of its departments, bureaus, or agencies, or of the government of the District of Columbia, nor shall any such institutions advertise or claim the power to issue degrees under the authority of Congress or otherwise than under the authority of the license granted to them by the Board of Education as hereinbefore provided. The prohibition in this section contained shall be deemed to include and is hereby declared applicable to any individual or individuals, association, or incorporation outside of the District of Columbia which shall undertake to do business in the District of Columbia or to confer degrees or certificates therein, and any such individual or individuals, association, or incorporation violating the provisions of this section shall be subject to the penalty hereinafter in section 586f provided.

SEC. 586f. Any person or persons who shall, directly or indirectly, participate in, aid, or assist in the conferring of any degree by any unlicensed individual or individuals, association, or institution, or by any individual or individuals, association, or institution whose license has been revoked, or shall advertise or claim any authority to confer any such degree, except in pursuance of the provisions of this act, or who shall violate the provisions of the section of this act immediately preceding shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall be punished by a fine of not more than $2,000, or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, on page 2, line 17, there is one word that needs to be changed to make the English right. The verb "is" should be changed to "are." I offer that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIMIT OF TIME FOR DECISIONS OF UNITED STATES COURTS

The bill (S. 726) to make it the duty of certain courts of the United States to render decisions within certain maximum limits of time was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "final," to strike out "within four months after the submission of such matter" and insert "as soon as possible after such submission and in all cases not to exceed five months thereafter"; on the same page, to strike out:

SEC. 2. The United States Circuit Courts of Appeal and the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall decide every such matter, within six months after submission.

And on page 2, line 1, to change the number of the section from "3" to "2," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the district courts of the United States and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall decide every matter submitted in a cause, whether interlocutory or final, as soon as possible after such submission and in all cases in not to exceed five months thereafter.

SEC. 2. As to matters already submitted in any of said courts the period of time herein limited shall run from the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1748) relating to the qualifications of jurors in the Federal courts was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it seems to me that is a very important measure. Apparently it changes the general practice with reference to jurors. I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SISKIYOU NATIONAL FOREST, OREG.

The bill (S. 3162) to authorize the improvement of the Oregon Caves in the Siskiyou National Forest, Oreg., was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be hereby authorized to construct and maintain such improvements within and near the Oregon Caves in the Siskiyou National Forest, Oreg., as are necessary for the comfort and convenience of the visiting public, including the purchase of materials and equipment for lighting the caves and washing the interior thereof, and providing easier accessibility and traversibility thereof, and providing an additonal exit or entrance, and for installing such materials and equipment; and for the aforesaid purposes the sum of $35,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DUPLICATE CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR FOR WIDOW OF LIEUT. COL. WILLIAM J. SPERRY

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) authorizing the Secretary of War to award a duplicate Congressional Medal of Honor for the widow of Lieut. Col. William J. Sperry was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES. May we have a brief explanation of that bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, this is a bill authorizing the issuance of a duplicate Congressional Medal of Honor to the widow of a Civil War veteran, Lieut. Col. William J. Sperry. The widow lost the medal and the citations of honor in the Vermont flood, with all her other belongings except the clothes she wore at the time.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the joint resolution.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, I am quite familiar with that case, and I know that it is all right.

Mr. JONES. I say, I have no objection to the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to award a duplicate Congressional Medal of Honor to Lieut. Col. William J. Sperry."

WILLIAM F. WHEELER

The bill (H. R. 1530) to amend the military record of William F. Wheeler was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES. Let us have an explanation of that bill, Mr. President. It seems that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] reported it.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, this is one of those claims for relieving Civil War veterans of a dishonorable discharge. The facts are all stated in the report.

Mr. JONES. I see that this bill has been reported in the House and has passed the House at one time. I am perfectly willing to take the report of the Senate committee upon any bill of this kind that has passed the House.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act for the relief of William F. Wheeler."

GEORGE A. WINSLOW

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD TIGH

The bill (H. R. 6364) for the relief of Edward Tigh was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This bill is reported adversely. Without objection, it will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, apparently that bill has passed the House. The Senate committee makes an adverse report upon it. As I stated a moment ago, I am perfectly willing to accept a bill that has passed the House in a matter of this kind. I should like to have the Senator from Wisconsin make a brief explanation as to why the Senate committee makes this adverse recommendation on the House bill.

Mr. BLAINE. May I have the report on that bill? I do not seem to have a report in my file.

Mr. JONES. Apparently the report is not in the files.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

AGNES M'MANUS

The bill (S. 471) for the relief of Agnes McManus and George J. McManus was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $14,400, and when appropriated the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay same to Agnes McManus and George J. McManus, or to the survivors of them, covering rental on their building in Ranger, Tex., at the reasonable rental thereof of $1,800 per year from June 5, 1920, to June 5, 1928, the United States Government having occupied the said building as a post office since the said June 5, 1920, without having paid any rental therefor; and should the Post Office Department desire to use such building after June 5, 1928, it is directed to enter into a lease satisfactory to the owner thereof prior to such date, otherwise to vacate such premises by that date.

Mr. JONES. Let us have a brief explanation of that bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, this is to pay the owners of a building at Ranger, Tex., what the department considers a reasonable rental for a period of some eight years. No rental has yet been paid. The Post Office Department, after examining the situation, found that this sum represented a reasonable rental.

Mr. JONES. How does it come that no rent has been paid for six or seven or eight years?

Mr. SHEPPARD. For some reason the parties could not reach an agreement as to what the owner had agreed to furnish. The post-office inspector reported that the owners had not complied with all the terms. Yet the Government continued to occupy the building. It was found that the owners had complied with all the terms, but no rent was forthcoming and the Government remained. The owner frequently asked the Government to vacate the building if it would not pay the rent. It has occupied the building for some eight years and has not paid anything.

This is a bill to provide that the Government shall pay what is considered a reasonable rental. It is provided further that if a reasonable rental can not be agreed upon for the future, the Government must vacate. At present the Government does not vacate and does not pay.

Mr. JONES. Did the committee look into the situation carefully and determine that this was a reasonable rental for that period of time?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The committee examined the situation very carefully, and found that the sum carried in this measure represented a fair and reasonable rental.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMER D. LEWIS

The bill (S. 1448) for the relief of Omer D. Lewis was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,573.25 to Omer D. Lewis for the purpose of reimbursing him for expenses incurred for hospital and doctor's fees paid and serious personal injuries received while aiding Federal officers engaged in suppressing the sale of liquor to Indians, the same to be immediately available.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VALIDATION OF ACQUISITION OF CANADIAN PROPERTY

The bill (S. 1738) for the validation of the acquisition of Canadian properties by the War Department and for the relief of certain disbursing officers for payments made thereon was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. May we have an explanation of that bill? I see that the Senator who reported it is not present, and I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

INSURANCE AND INTEREST ON WHEAT

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we return to Calendar 453, Senate Joint Resolution 59, authorizing the President to ascertain, adjust, and pay certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920, as per a certain contract authorized by the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Whereas it is provided in the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel (ch. 53, 40 Stat. L., approved Aug. 10, 1917, and ch. 125, 40 Stat. L., approved Mar. 4, 1919), wherein the President was authorized to determine and fix a guaranteed price, to be paid producers of wheat, and wherein the President was further authorized as follows:

"Whenever the President shall find it essential in order to carry out the guarantees aforesaid, or to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder, he is authorized to make reasonable compensation for handling, transportation, insurance, and other charges with respect to wheat and wheat flour of said crops and for storage thereof in elevators, on farms, and elsewhere"; and

Whereas the President by an Executive order (No. 3087), dated May 14, 1919, in pursuance of the power conferred on him by said act, did order as follows:

"I further find it essential and hereby direct that in order to carry out the guaranties made producers of wheat of the crops of 1919, and to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder, the United States wheat director utilize the services of the Food Administration Grain Corporation—now the United States Grain Corporation by reason of a change of name authorized by Executive order—as an agency of the United States, and I authorize the Food Administration Grain Corporation * * * to enter into such voluntary agreements to make such arrangements and to do and perform all such acts and things as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of said act"; and

Whereas the United States Grain Corporation, in pursuance of said Executive order, and, for the purpose of carrying out and making effective the guaranteed price, made and entered into, a certain contract, known as "the grain dealers' agreement," with various independent and farmer grain firms and grain elevator companies in Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, Missouri, Wyoming, and Oklahoma, and wherein it was agreed as follows:

"Fourth. In case the dealer—the elevator firms—shall be unable, after using every effort and all diligence to ship in any week such total of grain as makes the equivalent of at least 20 per cent of the amount of wheat in his elevator and owned by him at the beginning of such week, the grain corporation shall pay to the dealer to cover insurance and interest for such week seven-twentieths of a cent per bushel on the wheat in the elevator owned by him at the beginning of such week"; and

Whereas the President, in an Executive order, dated August 21, 1920, did approve, ratify, and confirm all acts done or authorized by the said United States Grain Corporation in carrying out and making the guaranteed price effective; and

Whereas a number of claims of the said grain dealers, for money earned under said contract, still remains unpaid, and are now justly due said claimants: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to ascertain the amounts due on said claims, and he is further authorized to adjust and pay said claims, as ascertained to be due said claimants, out of any funds now in the hands of the United States Grain Corporation, and belonging to the United States, or out of the funds in the United States Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, and the President is authorized to make payment thereof therefrom to the several persons entitled thereto, as their respective interests may appear.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES E. TRUSSELL

The bill (S. 2673) for the relief of James E. Trussell was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, James E. Trussell, who was a private in Company K, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged therefrom: Provided, That other than as above set forth no bounty, pay, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to or by reason of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3151) to limit the jurisdiction of district courts of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the purpose of the bill.

Mr. JONES. I see that the Senator who introduced it and who reported it is not here, being necessarily absent, so I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2612) for the relief of Mary Ellen Tiefenthaler was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. May we have an explanation of that? I will ask that it go over if no one is present to explain it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ATLANTIC WORKS OF BOSTON, MASS.

The bill (S. 2655) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the Atlantic Works of Boston, Mass., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $133,872.44 to the Atlantic Works of Boston, Mass., being the difference between the actual cost of the construction of the revenue cutter Daniel Manning and the amount paid under the contract entered into for the building of said vessel, as found by the Court of Claims and reported in Senate Document No. 5, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, that involves quite a large sum of money. Will not the Senator from Delaware explain it?

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this bill is to pay this company a sum stated in the bill, which was the excess cost to which the company was put in delivering this special type of boat to the Government.

The contract price was paid by the Government, and the amount of excess cost was referred to the Court of Claims, and the sum set up in the bill was found by the Court of Claims to have been expended by the company in properly building and constructing this boat.

In the course of the construction of the boat it was found that it was to be of a novel construction, a character of construction that the Federal Government had theretofore not indulged in, and the contract was very severe in its terms, the Government inspectors were more severe in their terms, and by several changes made it very much harder upon the contracting company to deliver the boat in time. The boat was not delivered in time by reason of that, and increased cost was incurred by the building company, but the boat was finally accepted, and has proved satisfactory.

As I said, the matter was referred to the Court of Claims to ascertain the facts, and the Court of Claims has found that the shipbuilding company did incur these expenses, legitimate expenses, over and above the amount of the contract price.

I would say to the Senator that we have had several cases not unlike this lately. One was that of the Fore River Shipbuilding Co., in which a similar state of facts came before us. That was a more recent case. In the case to which I have referred the Government made a contract with the Fore River Shipbuilding Co., and the contract was put through, but on account of the imposition of extras, so to speak, by the Federal Government, and the increased cost of construction growing out of circumstances over which the shipbuilding company had no control, the excess cost was placed upon the shipbuilding company. Recourse was had by way of a claim bill in Congress, the facts were examined into, and Congress passed a bill to pay the excess price. So that in principle this is the same as that case.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the Senator whether there was anything under the terms of the contract that warranted paying for what you might term "extras"?

Mr. BAYARD. It is very true that there was a deliberate contract entered into by the shipbuilding company, but the Court of Claims found that the shipbuilding company lived up to every possible phase of the contract it could under the circumstances, but that it was placed under undue handicaps by reason of the novelty of the form of construction. It was a character of boat that never had been built by the Government or private parties before.

Mr. JONES. Did they not take that into account when they entered into the contract to build the boat?

Mr. BAYARD. It was supposed they had, but it seemed that they had not. More than that, the Government made necessary the doing of certain extra things by changing the contract.

Mr. JONES. Did not the contract provide for such contingencies as that?

Mr. BAYARD. Generally speaking, I think the Senator is right. But, as I stated a moment ago, in the case of the Fore River Shipbuilding Co. contract, Congress responded when it found that the company had lived up to its contract, and the Government had gotten a good bargain. This boat has been used ever since.

Mr. JONES. I am rather interested in the situation, because I have a bill which I think is very much on all fours with the pending one, under the explanation the Senator gives.

Mr. BAYARD. The Government got its money's worth in this case. The Court of Claims found that it was a necessary amount expended by the shipbuilding company, and I think in justice and equity the company should be reimbursed.

Mr. JONES. I do not know what action the department took in reference to this bill originally. Did the department recommend it?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I have a bill pending now before the Committee on Claims wherein it is at least the contention of the claimant that he was compelled to make additional expenditures on account of circumstances over which he had no control, and yet I find that the War Department reports adversely against such a claim. If we are to deal in equities in these matters, then I think we ought to apply the rule equitably to all these claims when they come to Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. I quite agree with the Senator. I think the departments are rather cheeseparing in their reports to Congress. They get more than value received.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is the committee report unanimous?

Mr. BAYARD. It is unanimous.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is this the amount the Court of Claims has agreed was due the company?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the department approved it?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA

The bill (S. 1275) to create an additional judge for the southern district of Florida was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida, who shall reside in said district, and whose compensation, duties, and powers shall be the same as now provided by law for the judge of said district.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation as to the need for this additional judge. Conditions are such out in my State that the people have been pressing for an additional judge for five or six years; yet I have been unable to convince the committee that there was sufficient business to justify it, while, as a matter of fact, the judges there are working day and night, but can not keep up with the business. So I am interested in knowing the sort of a showing the Senator made to the committee to induce them to provide for an additional judge.

Mr. FLETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Florida showed nothing to the committee. But with the discernment for which he is justly famous he had his bill referred to a sympathetic subcommittee, to the members of which he demonstrated the necessity for an additional Federal judge in the State of Florida.

If the able Senator from Washington will follow the course pursued by the Senator from Florida, he may obtain the desired result.

Mr. JONES. Who is the chairman of the subcommittee?

Mr. NEELY. The able Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN].

Mr. JONES. I think I shall look up that subcommittee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I may say that I had nothing to do with the naming of the subcommittee, but I was entirely satisfied with it. We did have a hearing before the subcommittee, and it reported unanimously in favor of the bill, and the whole committee makes a unanimous report. We were able to show the need for this additional judge.

Some 20 years ago the line between the northern and southern district of Florida was changed, so that it threw into the southern district of Florida at least two-thirds of the population and of the territory of the State. That district runs from the northern boundary line of the State, the Georgia line, to Key West, nearly 600 miles. The territory embraces over a million population, and great distances intervene between the places for holding court.

There is no question, as far as economy is concerned, but that the salary of this judge would be earned in one term of court held in that district in the matter of jurors' fees, witness fees, and that sort of thing.

In addition to that, just to be brief, the Chief Justice has been obliged to assign judges from other portions of the country to hold court in that district. There have been assigned to that district Judge Henry D. Clayton, from Alabama; Judge Grubb, from Alabama; and Judge Hunt was recently there from California, and they all have certified that this judge is needed.

In addition to that, the Chief Justice himself, to whom this bill was referred by the Attorney General, has stated, and I have this letter here if the Senator wants to read it, that there is need for this additional judge. The department itself is in favor of the bill. They know the conditions and the need for this additional judge.

I do not think there could be anything added to what we have been able to show respecting the need for this additional judge.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, about the only difficulty that I would have in making such a showing as Florida makes is that I have not been able to get the Chief Justice of the United States to acquaint himself with the conditions out in Washington. Furthermore, the geographical conditions are a little bit different. It is true that the distances the judges and the witnesses and the jurors have to travel, with only one court in Florida, are very much greater than in my State; but as far as the business necessary to be done is concerned, I think probably we can make a stronger showing. Hardly six months passes without our having judges sent in from the outside. I shall not object to this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Be it enacted, etc., That the second paragraph of section 546 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended by inserting after the word "instruments," where it first occurs in that paragraph, the words "or any release thereof or any release of a conditional bill of sale," so that said second paragraph will read as follows:

"And it shall not be necessary for the recorder of deeds to spread such instruments, or any release thereof or any release of a conditional bill of sale, upon the records of his office, but the same shall be indexed in the manner as deeds to real estate are indexed, and said instruments shall be kept on file and shall be open to inspection by the public and shall have the same force and legal effect as if they were actually recorded in the books of said office. For filing and indexing such aforesaid instruments the recorder of deeds shall collect $1 each."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORTER BROS. & BIFFLE

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, speaking for the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], I ask that we recur to Calendar No. 85, Senate bill 1476, for the relief of Porter Bros. & Biffle and certain other citizens.

Macey, of Anne Arundel County, Md., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 in full compensation for the death of his infant daughter, Eleanor Macey, who was killed December 14, 1925, by reason of the negligence of the operator of a United States Navy commissary truck.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is also authorized and directed to pay to Marguerite Macey, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,250, in full compensation for personal injuries, medical and funeral expenses, and loss of automobile, which resulted by reason of the negligence of the operator of a United States Navy commissary truck.

HARRY C. SAXTON

The bill (S. 1499) for the relief of Harry C. Saxton was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to extend to Harry C. Saxton, who suffered injury to, and consequent subsequent loss of, his right foot on May 19, 1905, while in discharge of his duty as a mechanic in the Public Health and Marine Hospital Service at Reedy Island Quarantine Station, Port Penn, Del., the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, and acts amendatory thereof; compensation to be provided hereunder as if the provisions of the act approved September 7, 1916, and amendatory acts, had been operative on May 19, 1905.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think we ought to have an explanation of the bill because apparently this man was injured about 11 years before the act was passed. If we are to bring such persons under the compensation act, why should we not make the act itself retroactive?

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, if the Senator would read the report he would find in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury a complete statement of the facts in the case. This man was injured while moving a safe down at Reedy Island Quarantine Station on the Delaware River on the date mentioned. The matter went on from time to time and finally resulted in the loss of his leg. As a matter of fact, although it does not appear here, the bill was introduced two or three times in the House. The man at that time lived in New Jersey. Three or four years ago he moved to Delaware and at his instance this year I introduced a bill. It would appear that the bill never got out of the committee in the House. I do not know why. The papers do not disclose any report from any department in relation to it, so I assume the bill was not pressed in the House.

The reason why the bill is brought here in this way instead of giving a flat sum as originally called for, the Secretary of the Treasury recommended that the terms of the workmen's compensation act of 1916 be extended to him, that he may be examined by the authorities under that act and such relief given him under that act as they may find is due him.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator see any objection to having a general act passed under which those who may have been injured prior to the passage of that act may be brought within its terms?

Mr. BAYARD. I think the provisions of the amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury are probably wise, because it is very hard for the department, because of the lapse of time, to determine the amount accurately from the information they might get from the medical officers, and so forth. The only thing they can get is the general situation from the record of the case. The Secretary was of the opinion that it would be a wise thing to relegate this case to the terms of the compensation act, let him appear before the compensation board, and be given what compensation they deem wise from the facts arising in the case.

Mr. JONES. And he so recommended?

Mr. BAYARD. He drew up the amendment himself and of course recommended it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. J. BRYSON

The bill (H. R. 5075) for the relief of W. J. Bryson was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $500, to reimburse W. J. Bryson for the amount paid on the bond of one John Searight, defendant in the case of the United States against John Searight, in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa, the said John Searight having been subsequently returned to the custody of the United States marshal through the efforts and at the expense of said Bryson.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SANITARIUM CO., OF PORTLAND, OREG.

The bill (H. R. 5923) for the relief of the Sanitarium Co., of Portland, Oreg., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $1,180 to the Sanitarium Co., of Portland, Oreg., for the purpose of reimbursing said corporation in that amount, which was disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States and deducted from moneys due the Sanitarium Co., under its contracts with the Secretary of the Interior dated, respectively, January 25, 1919, and June 11, 1920, for the care and maintenance of the legally adjudged insane of Alaska.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OWNERS OF SCHOONER "ADDISON E. BULLARD"

The bill (S. 1486) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Addison E. Bullard was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, do I understand that objection was made?

Mr. CURTIS. Personally I know nothing about the bill, and have no objection, but a Senator, who is attending a committee meeting, asked me to request that it go over.

Mr. BLACK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edge	Keyes	Reed, Pa.
Barkley	Edwards	King	Robinson, Ind.
Bayard	Fess	McKellar	Sackett
Bingham	Fletcher	McLean	Sheppard
Black	Frazier	McMaster	Shortridge
Blaine	Gerry	McNary	Smith
Blease	Gillett	Mayfield	Smoot
Borah	Gould	Metcalf	Steiwer
Bratton	Greene	Moses	Stephens
Brookhart	Hale	Neely	Swanson
Capper	Harris	Norbeck	Tyson
Caraway	Hawes	Nye	Wagner
Copeland	Hayden	Oddie	Waterman
Couzens	Heflin	Overman
Curtis	Jones	Phipps
Dale	Kendrick	Pittman

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). I wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness.

Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

J. W. ANDERSON

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, a few moments ago, during my absence, Order of Business No. 647, being Senate bill 1387, for the relief of J. W. Anderson, when reached on the calendar was passed over. I ask that the Senate recur to that bill. I desire to make a statement concerning it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to recurring to the bill mentioned by the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the beneficiary of this bill was an employee of the District of Columbia at its workhouse near Lorton, Va. While in pursuit of some prisoners who had escaped, he jumped from a moving train and was so badly injured that one of his legs had to be amputated. The amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill is to be paid out of District funds.

Formerly it was usual to pay a specific sum of money in compensation for injuries of this kind, but since the accident occurred—whether one, two, or three years ago I forget—a compensation law for the District of Columbia has been enacted. That law covers compensation to employees of the District who have been injured. If they file for compensation under that law, they are reimbursed.

As this bill was introduced it provided for an appropriation of $10,000. The bill was referred to the District Commissioners, who recommend that the claimant should be paid the amount he would have received provided the compensation law which has since been passed were applicable to his case.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I withdraw the objection which I made to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$4,700," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be paid to J. W. Anderson, by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, out of the funds of the District of Columbia, by warrant drawn upon the Treasurer of the United States, the sum of $4,700 for personal injuries received March 19, 1912, while in the service of the District government as an employee of the District workhouse.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OWNERS OF SCHOONER "ADDISON E. BULLARD"

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, at the time I suggested the absence of a quorum we had reached Order of Business No. 674, being Senate bill 1486, for the relief of the owners of the schooner Addison E. Bullard. I desire to go back to that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. That does not mean that there is no objection to the bill, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is merely for the purpose of considering the bill at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as that is concerned, I have a committee meeting to attend immediately.

Mr. BLACK. Do I understand that the Senator from Utah objects to the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; I object to the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Do I understand that the Senator knows anything about it?

Mr. SMOOT. I beg pardon.

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator object from knowledge of the bill? Shall I explain it to him?

Mr. SMOOT. I have all the records regarding the bill, but I do not have them with me, and I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, before the bill goes over, in view of the fact that the Senator from Alabama has asked that the Senate return to it, I merely wish to say a word. The Senator called my attention to the bill, I think, yesterday, or perhaps the day before—I am not quite positive which—and sent the report on the bill for me to look over. I simply have not had the time to read the report. It was sent to me only a day or two ago and we have a few other things to do here. At this moment some of us should be attending a meeting of the Finance Committee. The Senator sent a note to me to ask what my objection to the bill was. I can not now give any specific objection to the bill, and I may not have any objection to it, but I must have time at least to investigate it. As I understand, this is the first time that this particular bill has been reached on the call of the calendar. Frequently bills go over two or three times before they are finally passed upon, and in 24 hours I simply have not had time to give the matter any thought.

Mr. BLACK. I should like to explain the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will merely say at this time—and then I must leave the Chamber—that the owners of the schooner Addison E. Bullard have had their day in court. They tried to come to an agreement with the Shipping Board as to the amount to be paid for the loss sustained in connection with the shipment of a certain cargo of goods during the war. All other persons similarly situated made a settlement with the Government of the United States. In this case, however, the owners refused and went into court. The lower court gave them a judgment. They were not satisfied with that, and appealed to the superior court. The superior court decided that they had no claim such as was alleged in the suit. Now, they come here, and ask the Congress of the United States to give them $80,000, as I remember, when the courts of the country have said that they were not entitled to that sum.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it is just a little bit strange that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the chairman of the Finance Committee, a man who has numerous burdens upon his shoulders, both political and governmental, should have found time to become so remarkably familiar with an individual claim that comes from the State of Alabama and is one of the hundreds of claims that are upon the calendar. I say again it is somewhat remarkable that the Senator from Utah, on the first call of the calendar when this bill is reached, should be able to state in detail everything in connection with this claim. There is, of course, a reason for it. That reason I can only surmise.

Mr. SMOOT. I will tell the Senator the reason.

Mr. BLACK. No; I can surmise. I have the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. But there is no need to surmise, for I will tell the Senator the facts.

Mr. BLACK. Sometimes the truth can be obtained by surmising and sometimes it can be obtained in other ways.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Alabama question the accuracy of the statement I made regarding the bill?

Mr. BLACK. At present I am commenting upon the Senator's remarkable familiarity with one individual claim.

Mr. SMOOT. It was before the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BLACK. I think I have the floor. I was commenting upon the Senator's familiarity with one individual claim, when the burdens of state rest upon his shoulders, when he is the chairman of the Finance Committee, when he is the chairman and interrogator in various other committees, and expressing my surprise that he should have found time to investigate a claim coming up from the State of Alabama.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BLACK. I would rather finish.

Mr. EDGE. In justice to the Senator from Utah, I wish to state that I am afraid the Senator from Alabama has not followed the activities of the Senator from Utah. Almost every time the calendar is called you will find both Senators from Utah on guard in the Chamber, and very, very few bills go through without their demonstrating considerable knowledge about them.

Mr. BLACK. That is true, after they are here and look over the bills; but the Senator comes from another room, where he has been working, I presume, on financial matters or on other matters. I do not know exactly which is claiming his attention to-day. Working on those matters, he comes from another room, and, without looking at the calendar, rises and explains in detail this bill. It is just somewhat of a coincidence, I assume, that my good friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BLACK. I do not yield at present. It is just a little bit remarkable, or a coincidence, that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] should have left the objection in this case to the Senator from Utah. It is a coincidence, of course, that the chief counsel for the Shipping Board is a constituent of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I have not any apology to make for that.

Mr. BLACK. It is a coincidence that a few weeks ago we obtained a reduction of the appropriation by showing in the Senate that there were useless legal employees in the Shipping Board. It is also somewhat of a coincidence that the Senator from Utah, the gentleman who makes the objection to the consideration of this bill, is the one who stood up on the floor to defend the chief counsel of the Shipping Board and the employment of useless attorneys in the Shipping Board. It is just a little bit remarkable and somewhat of a coincidence that the Senator from Utah, the remarkable apostle of economy, should have been the chief spokesman of the Shipping Board on this floor when an effort was made to lop off useless employees in the legal department of the Shipping Board, more, even, than we knew at that time, because since that date I have had sent to me statistics, and I have them in my office, showing that they have spent for lawyers $192,000 more than appeared in the hearings before the Appropriations Committee. It is somewhat of a coincidence that when this bill comes up, offered by myself, who happens to have been to a slight degree instrumental in bringing about the amendment to reduce the salary of the chief counsel for the Shipping Board, Mr. Chauncey Parker, I believe, of Newark, or somewhere in New Jersey——

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BLACK. I do.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator is drawing inferences. I, of course, do not presume for a moment to suggest any inferences. I do not believe in inferences in debate. Does the Senator see any inference in the very statement he has made himself—that he was interested in this matter of litigation as an attorney before the Shipping Board, and has been active upon the floor of the Senate in endeavoring to reduce the salary of the chief counsel of the Shipping Board? I ask that question of the Senator in view of his drawing inferences.

Mr. BLACK. The statement that the Senator from Alabama is the attorney for this claimant is not true. It is wholly and completely untrue, if that is the inference that was intended to be left.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator is drawing inferences, and I am merely drawing attention to a statement of fact.

Mr. BLACK. Since the Senator drew an inference, I answer it by the statement that the inference, if it be an inference, that the Senator from Alabama is now or ever has been the attorney for this gentleman from Mobile who has the claim, is untrue.

Mr. EDGE. Has the Senator ever appeared before the Shipping Board in connection with the case?

Mr. BLACK. As a Senator of the United States, yes, sir; with regard to the claim of a citizen of Alabama.

Mr. EDGE. As a Senator of the United States or as a Senator elect of the United States?

Mr. BLACK. I do not know exactly what distinction the Senator is trying to draw. I was up here last March about the time when my term began. I do not recall whether I went there March 3 or March 5. Perhaps the Senator has gone down to Mr. Parker and has the dates. I do not know; I can not say about that; but I do know that here is a bill for the payment of the claim of a citizen of Alabama. The Shipping Board for 10 years have had his money. They know they have had it. They have had $83,000 which has been paid to them for him. That is the evidence which is a part of this record. That money was paid into the United States Treasury for this citizen of Alabama; and the legal department of the Shipping Board, in line with other claims, one of which I reported a few days ago, evidently not having enough to do, knowing that they owe the money, take it to the court, where the court says that the claim is moral, and not legal, just like a claim that I reported for the Senator from New York last week from the Claims Committee, where some people had paid money into the Shipping Board treasury.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. When I finish this statement. They had paid money into the Shipping Board treasury. There was $22,500 of that that belonged to the citizens, and there were two or three claims interposed for it. The Shipping Board attorneys took the matter all the way to the Supreme Court of the United States, on the ground that the Government could not be sued, although they owe the money, have always owed the money, and have never denied it. In the case of this citizen, to whom the board admit they owe the money, they passed a resolution and agreed to pay it to him if he would buy a tugboat. He said he did not need a tugboat; that he was not in the tugboat business; so they canceled it, and said, "We will fight you. Of course the Government has the money. The Government is going to keep it. The Government is bigger than you are. We are the representatives of the Government," with 45 lawyers down here trying 62 cases in one year, drawing for it $262,000 of the money of the people. Then when this claim comes up—a claim for money which is justly due a citizen of this country, whose money they have held for 10 years for some reason—of course, the Shipping Board must be interested, because the objection comes from my good friend the genial Senator from New Jersey, who is the Senator from the State of the abode of the chief counsel of the Shipping Board.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I am not through.

Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Can I make a motion now to take up this bill? Is it in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the present occupant of the chair is advised that it is not in order, because the Senate is working under a unanimous-consent agreement to consider only unobjected bills.

Mr. BLACK. I can not make that motion until we finish, then.

Mr. CURTIS, Mr. EDGE, and Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to raise a parliamentary inquiry in reference to debate. As I understand, debate is limited to five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is limited to five minutes. The present occupant of the chair permitted the Senator from Alabama to exceed the limit somewhat.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I assure the present Presiding Officer that I shall not occupy five minutes. I shall not occupy three minutes.

It seems to me that the introduction of entirely extraneous matters into the consideration of an ordinary claims bill is a rather unusual proceeding.

As I have already stated to the Senate, this bill was drawn to my attention certainly not more than two days ago, and my impression is that it was only yesterday morning. I have absolutely no knowledge of the justification or otherwise of the bill. Perhaps the bill is absolutely justified in every way, as the Senator from Alabama endeavors to demonstrate; but when a bill is drawn to a Senator's attention, whether it be drawn to his attention by the Shipping Board or by any other citizen, it is usually considered the courteous thing to do to give him an opportunity to examine into the bill.

I have no prejudice whatever in the matter, and it is unnecessary for me even to make that suggestion, I think, after my service in the Senate of the United States; but I do most positively resent the implication, almost the charge, that because the distinguished chief counsel of the Shipping Board, Judge Parker, lives in New Jersey that should have the slightest thing to do with the merits or my consideration of this measure.

May I say in passing, in connection with Judge Parker, that he is one of the most distinguished jurists in the State of New Jersey. He came to the city of Washington absolutely at a sacrifice of one of the largest practices any lawyer in New Jersey has ever had. He was president of the State bar association and his position among the legal fraternity in New Jersey is absolutely unquestioned. Whatever his salary has been under the United States Government, I repeat, his service here has been absolutely at a decided personal financial sacrifice.

Ordinarily I should have no desire and would not even have attempted to make any suggestion of a defense, or, rather, an explanation; but in view of the fact that the Senator from Alabama has taken this unusual position in the consideration of an ordinary claim bill, which may be highly meritorious for all I know—I trust it is, and I trust I can join with him in its passage—I at least reserve the usual right, the ordinary right, to have a few hours to look into the merits of the bill and make some inquiries about the bill before imputations and almost accusations are delivered across this Chamber.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. EDGE. I yield the floor.

Mr. BLACK. Since the Senator has yielded the floor, may I make this statement: The Senator says the bill was called to his attention two days ago.

Mr. EDGE. Is not that correct?

Mr. BLACK. I understood that it was called to his attention and that he spoke to the Senator from Mississippi about it about three weeks ago.

Mr. EDGE. I have already informed the Senator from Alabama to that effect; and, if the Senator recalls, I also told him that I had forgotten all about it, and in view of the fact that he directed my attention to it I would gladly look into it. Is not that correct?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. EDGE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. And I gave the Senator the report, which is very short. It consists of about two pages. I sent it over to the Senator's office on yesterday, in order that he might read it. I had anticipated that probably the Shipping Board, by reason of the very matter I have suggested, would object to the bill and that the objection would go to the Senator. I have every reason to suppose it came from there. The Senator has not said it did not.

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of fact, the Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BLACK. It did not come from the Shipping Board?

Mr. EDGE. The request to look into this bill came to me from a Member of this body.

Mr. BLACK. It did not come from a member of the Shipping Board?

Mr. EDGE. It came from a Member of this body.

Mr. BLACK. Then, I misunderstood the Senator yesterday.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator certainly misunderstood me.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the Senator to say that it came from a member of the Shipping Board, and not from Mr. Parker.

Mr. EDGE. Of course, Mr. President, I have known—any Senator would know—about this controversy between the Shipping Board and the Senator from Alabama, who attacked the counsel for the Shipping Board in his objection to the independent offices bill; but so far as the particular bill in question is concerned the first information I had about it was from a Member of this body.

Mr. BLACK. And it has not come from any Shipping Board member at all?

Mr. EDGE. I have not even discussed it with a Shipping Board member, and if I had that certainly would not be an unusual proceeding to the slightest degree. I think it is my duty now to discuss it with the members of the Shipping Board, and I shall take great pains to do so.

Mr. BLACK. Would the Senator object to stating which Senator made the inquiry of him, so that I can find out if it came from Mr. Parker of the Shipping Board?

Mr. EDGE. The Senator can conduct his own case in his own way.

Mr. BLACK. I can not conduct it without the facts.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator is an able lawyer, and, of course, I do not claim membership in the legal fraternity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDGE. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I understood, objected before he left the Chamber.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from Utah is not here, and we were still discussing whether or not the bill would come up.

Mr. EDGE. Well, if that technicality means anything, I will object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (H. R. 9112) for the relief of William Roderick Dorsey and other officers of the Foreign Service of the United States who, while serving abroad, suffered by theft, robbery, fire, embezzlement, or bank failures losses of official funds, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I am very sorry that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is holding up Senate bill 1486. It is a meritorious bill. The Government owes this money to Mr. Turner, a citizen of Alabama, as my colleague [Mr. BLACK] has stated, and offered to pay him if he would take some junk. If he would let them tell him what he should take in settlement, they offered to pay him. I do not believe that there is a Senator here who would permit the Shipping Board to engage in such business as that. If this Government owes money to a citizen of Alabama, or of Kansas, or of any other State, it ought to pay him money. Why should they require him to take settlement in some property that the Government has?

Mr. Turner said he did not want the tugboat. Then they told him they would fight his claim. This Government is too big to indulge in such business as that. That is too small, it is too mean, it is contemptible.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, the Shipping Board disposed of several boats worth millions of dollars for very paltry sums. It may be that this tugboat that they offered the citizen of the Senator's State in settlement of a debt of $80,000 might have cost several millions.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know what it cost, but the board has no right, when it owes a citizen money, to offer him and try to compel him to take in settlement something that is not money.

Yes; they sold ships that cost the Government $800,000 for $2,100. They sold ships that cost the Government over $500,000 for $1,600. I called the attention of the Senate once before to an instance where they sold a ship like that for $1,600, and the man who bought it had it insured, lightning struck it, and he collected $35,000 insurance from the insurance company. That is the sort of business they are doing on the one hand, but on the other hand, in case a citizen, a patriotic, upstanding American citizen, is doing business with the Government, and the Government acknowledges it owes him money, eighty some odd thousand dollars, the Shipping Board goes to him and tells him, "If you take this ship in settlement, we will pay you, but if you will not take the ship we will not pay you, we will fight your claim."

Mr. President, when they do that, they are misrepresenting the Government, they are defeating the ends of justice, they are mistreating a sovereign citizen.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. MAYFIELD. In considering this bill before the Committee on Claims of the Senate we did not have any evidence as to the character of this tugboat. I was just wondering whether the Senator from Alabama could give the Senate any particular information about the tugboat which they wanted the citizen of his State to take in settlement of his claim. Just what kind of a boat is it?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not time to go into that. The first knowledge I had of that was the information given me by my colleague, who is perfectly familiar with the case in detail.

Mr. President, the Government does not deny that it owes this man, but now we have reached the point where they do not want to pay him. Mr. Parker, who is drawing a big salary, I understand, has tried only one case in the Supreme Court in a year. The Senator from New Jersey praises him as a great lawyer, but he has tried only one case, and he and all the lawyers with him on the board have tried only about 45 cases for the Government in a year, drawing nearly $300,000 in salaries. We ought to get rid of them, and the head of the board, Mr. Parker, ought to go first.

If he is angry at my colleague for making an attempt to bring down the number on that board to where it should be, to save money to the Government, and to have efficient service rendered, and he is calling on friends here to object to the payment of claims to citizens of my State for the purpose of intimidating and coercing a Senator, it is time this body was waking up to its duty. It ought to call Mr. Parker before some committee and ask him who authorized him to indulge in such activity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to say to the Senate that we will have something more to say about this claim; and if it is not going to be paid, we might just as well begin objecting to the passage of bills on the calendar, and start it now, because the objecting business is something others can take a hand in.

BILL PASSED OVER

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, are we on Order of Business 675?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. JONES. I do not see the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], who reported the bill, in the Chamber. It is a House bill, and I want to ask some questions about one or two items in it. Therefore I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, under objection.

NATIONAL FOREST LANDS

The bill (H. R. 9829) to extend the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 20, 1922, entitled "An act to consolidate national forest lands," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 11, after the word "Mexico" and the period, to insert the following: "The lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the national forests within or near whose exterior boundaries they are located."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LAKE OF THE WOODS

The bill (H. R. 10884) to amend the act entitled "An act to carry into effect provisions of the convention between the United States and Great Britain to regulate the level of Lake of the Woods concluded on the 24th day of February, 1925," approved May 22, 1926, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is not in the Chamber, but I know that he is very much interested in this bill, and it is a bill which ought to pass. It has passed the House and was unanimously reported by the committee of the Senate.

The intent and purpose of the bill is to expedite the carrying out of a treaty with Canada with reference to the Lake of the Woods. I do not believe there can be any valid objection to it.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the Senator what it provides for?

Mr. BORAH. It is designed to extend the acquisition of certain flowage easements and to make certain provisions as to measure of damages, and so forth.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber at the time the calendar was taken up, and I do not know at what number the call commenced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call commenced with Calendar No. 615.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 469, Senate bill 1731, to provide for the more complete development of vocational education in the several States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may we not complete the calendar before returning to that? There is only one more page. I will have no objection to the Senator's request when we shall have completed the call of the calendar.

Mr. GEORGE. I withdraw the request.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Utah, who is now absent from the Chamber, left a request that that bill go over, and on his behalf I make objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM RODERICK DORSEY

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I want the attention of the Senator from Washington for a moment. I was called out of the Chamber a moment ago, and was not here when House bill 1912, for the relief of William Roderick Dorsey and other officers of the Foreign Service of the United States who, while serving abroad, suffered by theft, robbery, fire, embezzlement, or bank failures losses of official funds, was reached. Since my return I have been informed that the Senator from Washington asked that the bill go over, stating that he wanted an explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator a question. On page 4, commencing with line 13, there is a provision for the reimbursement of Richard L. Sprague, American consul at Gibraltar, of the sum of £423.15. All the other items in this bill relating to matters arising in foreign countries are in American money. I was wondering why in that case the amount was designated as so many pounds, instead of in American money. I also wondered, with reference to the same item, why this man should have been required, or it may have been necessary for him, to go on and settle a judgment out of his own funds.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am not informed as to why he was required to do that, but, as a matter of fact, the record shows that he did make the settlement. This matter was investigated thoroughly by the department, and came to the House with a favorable recommendation. In fact, the bill itself, I am informed, was prepared by some one at the State Department. The House committee investigated the matter, the bill passed the House and came over to the Senate from the House, and the Senate committee simply took the records of the State Department and the recommendation, and followed them.

Mr. JONES. Did the department recommend these other items in American money and this item in British pounds?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes; that is what was done. The memorandum was all prepared by the State Department. I notice on page 14 of the report of the committee the number of pounds are given, and then it is stated in our money.

Mr. JONES. Does not the Senator think we ought to amend the bill by striking out the amount as given here and putting in the amount in American dollars?

Mr. STEPHENS. I rather think so.

Mr. JONES. I think that would better be done.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the bill. I have no doubt this man is entitled to be reimbursed for what he has paid out.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is the amount in dollars?

Mr. STEPHENS. It would be about $2,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 14 of the report the amount is given as $1,897.87.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator has no objection, I move to strike out, in line 13, page 4, "£423.15" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,897.87."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. As a matter of fact, I believe really the intention was to do that, but it was overlooked.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if there should not be a semicolon instead of a comma after "1926" in line 16? Is that the beginning of another claim?

Mr. JONES. No; I think not.

Mr. STEPHENS. No; that refers to the same matter. Mr. Sprague paid the judgment in favor of Smith, Imossi & Co.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

APPEALS FROM DISTRICT COURTS

The bill (H. R. 343) to amend section 128, subdivision (b), paragraph 1, of the Judicial Code as amended February 13, 1925, relating to appeals from district courts, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Idaho what change this bill makes in existing law?

Mr. BORAH. The bill is designed to clarify section 128 of the Judicial Code. At the present time there is an element of doubt as to whether certain orders of the district courts in Alaska, Hawaii, and other places are subject to appeal. This clarifies the code so as to leave no doubt of the right of appeal from a certain class of orders made by the district courts in those Territories.

Mr. BRATTON. I assume it is simply to make certain the right to appeal from interlocutory orders rendered by those courts?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. F. NICHOLS

The bill (S. 764) for the relief of J. F. Nichols was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 3, strike out the words "that the sum of $200 be, and is hereby, authorized to be appropriated" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to J. F. Nichols"; and in line 7, after the word "appropriated," to insert the words "the sum of $200," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to J. F. Nichols, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200 for the purpose of refunding to J. F. Nichols, the said sum paid in excess as a fine to the clerk of the United States district court at Tulsa, Okla., in the case of the United States against John Nichols, No. 463.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 8298) authorizing acquisition of a site for the farmers' produce market, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the two Senators from Maryland are not in the Chamber. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia suggested that the bill should go over if reached in their absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 11020) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this seems to be a very long bill, containing a large number of items. I think probably it would be better to have it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill goes over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 5687) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain public lands to the Cabazon Water Co., issue patent therefor, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire whether there are any lands privately owned that are included within the area to be sold; and if so, whether there is a proper provision for the protection of the private owners? I have no objection to the bill if those questions have been properly considered. I know in some of these areas which have been set apart for forest reserves the rights of private persons have been jeopardized if not altogether destroyed. Perhaps the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill goes over.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

PRAYER

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the new morning hours. In the joy of renewed strength and with glad hearts enable us to go forward unafraid and undisturbed. Through tasks faithfully performed, set free other of our highest and best impulses; may they be brought into splendid service. The blessing of a life lived wisely is not gold nor jewels, but more life—broader use of our powers, a healthier capacity, and a larger usefulness. Now, our Father, we pray that we are all here to dedicate our gifts to Thee; let us come and go just as Thy children, to speak the truth and to do Thy will. Oh, true success is to labor; to travel hopefully and blessedly day by day is far better than to arrive. Oh, fill our hearts with love, and then there shall be no place for hate; fill our minds with heaven, and then there shall be no place for hell; thus God shall be all in all. Bring us to the shades of evening weary though satisfied and not dishonored. Amen.

The message further announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1822) entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer or loan aeronautical equipment to museums and educational institutions," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. BINGHAM, and Mr. FLETCHER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

FLOOD CONTROL BILL

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of flood control.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of flood control. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting flood-control data for the RECORD that to my mind is of vital importance in the determination of the Mississippi River flood control bill that will soon come before the House for consideration.

It is universally conceded that the problem is of national importance and that it must be constructed by the Government without delay. Arguments before the House committee by witnesses were devoted to the effects of the flood and necessity for Federal aid.

All these were unquestioned. Practically no data was offered before the House or Senate committees disclosing the large financial interests that are concerned in the passage of a bill costing the Federal Government $1,000,000,000. The amount of increase in land values and other property by complete flood control is incalculable. I am in favor of flood control, but am opposed to this bill that prohibits contribution.

A brief word as to the checkered course of the flood control bill may be proper at the outset. Hearings were begun by the House committee on November 7, 1927, and over 300 witnesses were heard during the ensuing three months. Their testimony was strangely cumulative, for, as shown by the record, nearly all declared with unanimity that this is a national problem and should be built at national expense. Senators and Members living on the Mississippi or its tributaries or on other possible future flood projects were also of this same opinion prohibiting local contributions, and from the published list it will be discovered that these distinguished legislators made up about one-third of the total number of witnesses who furnished expert evidence for the use of the committee and who have an active interest in this or some other flood-control project.

After the hearings a bill was reported by a majority of the committee that provided no local contribution should be had and further provided for an appropriation of $325,000,000 with which to construct all the control works. Six minority members filed a report showing the estimated cost fixed by experts would reach $1,400,000,000 or about four times the amount fixed in the bill, and criticized other features of that bill.

Nothing further occurred until the tobogganing of a bill in record time through another deliberative body that can not be mentioned here as fully as it deserves.

That bill was reported and passed by the Senate about a week ago, or nearly five months after the hearings were begun by the House committee without any action on the House bill. In an effort to get something definite before the House and avoid needless differences in conference, particularly where both committees had majorities opposed to local contribution, and there was no choice the House committee reported the Senate bill last week with several inconsequential amendments, and that bill is now on the calendar for action after over 20 weeks of hearings and long consideration of the problem.

The one outstanding objection I wish here to discuss is a refusal to permit any local contributions from beneficiaries of a flood-control project that will cost the Federal Government $1,000,000,000.

THIS BILL PREVENTS ANY CONTRIBUTION FROM BENEFICIARIES

In all other Government-aid legislation the Government is protected from inordinate demands and gross favoritism by requiring local contribution where private interests are primarily benefited. Benefits in this flood-control measure often not "special" in character reach presumably into billions of dollars in the aggregate.

From section 1 of the bill—S. 3740—I quote:

> That it is hereby declared to be the sense of Congress that the principle of local contribution toward cost of flood-control work which has been incorporated in all previous national legislation on the subject (and is now the law) is sound as recognizing the special interest of the local population in its own protection and as a means of preventing inordinate requests for unjustified items of work having no material national interest * * * and in view of the gigantic scale of the project involving flood waters of a volume and flowing from a drainage area largely outside the States most affected and far exceeding those of any other river in the United States no local contribution to the project herein adopted is required.

On that statement the Senate bill 3740 as passed by the Senate and as reported with amendments by the House requires the Federal Government to acquire for flood ways 3,713,696 acres, or probably an additional 10 per cent for levees, spillways, and other purposes, making a total of about 4,000,000 acres of land belonging to 7,500 separate owners. This land must be acquired by separate suits for condemnation unless purchased by Government agencies for prices the agency deems "reasonable," and the land acquired by the original owners in many cases for a few cents an acre is required to be procured by the Government at a minimum estimate of $100,000,000, and a possible or probable expense of $300,000,000 after costs and all expenses are considered.

OVER 7,500 SUITS INVITED BY THE BILL

All are familiar with lands not worth $10 an acre that have brought nearer ten times that amount when needed by a railroad that submitted values to a jury of good men and true. Over 7,500 such cases are invited by the terms of the bill unless bought at private sale.

This is only one element in the lower Mississippi flood-control project that is reasonably certain to cost the Federal Government in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000. Counting $100,000,000 estimated for bank, flood-control protection, $71,000,000 to $100,000,000 for changing railway tracks and relocations, together with—> just compensation to be paid by the United States for all property taken, damaged, or destroyed * * * including all expenditures by persons, corporations and public-service corporations, made necessary to adjust or conform their property because of the spillways, flood ways, or diversion channels herein provided.

All these may make a draft on the Federal Treasury of far more than $1,000,000,000. Engineers can not submit any close guess. Laymen, including Congress, must go it blind.

From those who are best acquainted with the probable cost and have expert knowledge of the subject, I submit an estimate for the Mississippi River project asked for from the Army engineers that reaches practically $1,000,000,000. The estimate of land cost to the Government of 4,000,000 acres, figured at $75 an acre at my suggestion, is one item that may not be reached, for the actual value of the land ought not to average near that amount, but other costs not considered by the board I believe will bring the amount up to or in excess of that figure, and that evidence was submitted to the committee for cut-over land value.

The estimate is as follows:

ENGINEERS' ESTIMATE OF COST TO GOVERNMENT

Costs that may develop from the Jones flood control bill

Original Army engineers' project	$296,400,000
All rights of way and drainage, plus flowage and damages, Bonnet Carre and Bayou Des Glaizes Loop	11,500,000
Land, damages, etc., Birds Point-New Madrid flood way, as estimated by local people (Mr. Reid)	18,500,000
Boeuf and Atchafalaya flood ways—3,713,696 acres, at $75 per acre	278,600,000
Railroad claims estimated by railroad chief engineers' committee—see page 146 report of Chairman Frank R. Reid—flood control in the Mississippi Valley, March, 1928	71,800,000
Highway claims if allowed	11,500,000
Masonry spillways if substituted by board	54,000,000
Additional freeboard of 4 feet if substituted by board	167,000,000
Atchafalaya revetments (M. R. C.)	4,500,000
Total	913,800,000
From the surveys of tributaries authorized there may develop tributary and upper river work far exceeding $86,000,000 (estimate for parts affected by backwater). The total will be dependent upon local contributions and rights-of-way payments adopted	86,000,000
Grand total	999,800,000

From the survey authorized from Baton Rouge to Cape Girardeau there may develop a reservoir project which would substitute $1,500,000,000 for the above.

All this Federal expense, reaching from $7 to $10 or more for every man, woman, and child in the country, is to be made without any local contribution to protect 30,000 square miles of land or 19,000,000 acres of land, of which 15,000,000 acres outside the flood ways will be increased in value from small amounts upward of $100 an acre in the highly valuable alluvial valley of the Mississippi, without any local contribution.

The corporation or large individual owners hereinafter named may now be as rich as Crœsus, the holders of millions of drainage bonds, valued on the market as low as 40 cents, will now reach par all at the expense of the Federal Government, without contribution.

BURYING THE FORMER MINORITY REPORT

On page 143 of the report on H. R. 8219, No. 1072, is buried, out of sight, the protest of six members of the Flood Control Committee against this wholesale gift to private and corporate interests required to be made by the Government in this humanitarian effort to protect life and property in the valley. Local contribution was there urged, from pages 145 to 154, for reasons therein specifically set forth.

That report was buried, of course, by accident, but it is set forth herein because of its importance.

In report on this bill, No. 1100, page 98, appears a statement regarding the California-Sacramento River project. The people in that valley, the report discloses, have expended over $100,000,000 for flood control and land reclamation under circumstances largely similar to those existing in the Mississippi Valley. The State and Federal Governments are now asked to join in a $51,000,000 project to protect the lives and property of that great valley. Of this amount the Federal Government is asked to pay only $17,600,000, or one-third of the total.

The State of California contributes the same amount and property owners the remainder. Statements to the committee showed cases of physical and financial distress approaching destitution, but two-thirds of the total expense is borne by local interests, whereas 1,757,560 acres of land held by Mississippi Valley corporations and 1,101,154 acres held by large owners, all in the proposed Mississippi flood way, are to be paid the highest price fixed by local juries—without contribution from these same owners, who own by far the largest portion of the 15,000,000 acres of other land hereafter to be given complete protection.

By what argument can the lumber owners of Chicago and the Mississippi River Valley be given all this vast increase in property values—without local contribution—when the people in California pay two-thirds of the cost for like protection.

LARGE FINANCIAL INTERESTS TO BENEFIT

In other words, those benefited include the Descha Land & Timber Co., the Price Ledbetter Land Co., the Madison Land

Co., the Jerome Hardwood Co. (with 22,726 acres alone in the flood ways), the Harris Drew Land Co., the Chicot Farms Co., the Bonita Lumber Co., the Louisville Cooperage Co., the Inter-State Cooperage Co. (with 48,120 acres in the flood way), the Pioneer Cooperage Co. (32,000 acres), Singer Sewing Machine Co., Tall Timber & Good Pine Lumber Co. (53,010 acres in the flood way), Tensas Delta Land Co. (121,856 acres), and hundreds of other corporations that appear in the list I offer herewith furnished by Army engineers under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Herewith I am printing the names of 1,000 owners of land the Government is required to deal with. Seventeen per cent of the 7,500 owners of the 4,000,000 acres own 77 per cent of all lands in the proposed flood ways.

It will be noted from the lists herewith submitted that many of the large owners hold over 5,000 acres of land in the flood ways alone, and that proportion indicates three times the amount on the average of lands so owned outside the flood ways which are to be increased in values from 100 per cent to many times that amount by complete flood control, at Government expense—without local contribution. Take two large owners in the Concordia Parish whose names are together with an aggregate of 30,000 acres in the flood way, and if the average holds good over 100,000 acres owned by them outside the flood way are to be vastly increased in value. On what theory of right or justice will the Government grant this vast wealth to people who fortunately live or have property in the Mississippi Valley instead of in California, possibly bought for a few cents an acre according to some of the data presented.

The statement herewith submitted of property owners of nearly 4,000,000 acres to be acquired by the Government under the bill discloses the acreage held by corporations and large owners reaching over 75 per cent of lands to be used in the various flood ways. The lists cover States, parishes, and other data and are offered at the outset to indicate the character of a vast project that has enlisted the sympathies of both Congress and the country, but has had no consideration by either House in so far as applying the ordinary rules of either public or private business is concerned:

ABOVE BENEFITS AFFECT LANDS, BONDS, AND OTHER PROPERTY

The foregoing data affects only one phase of the problem because every debt in the alluvial valley, whether represented by bonds, mortgage, or other evidence, will be increased in value. Those who have taken over millions of acres of farm lands on mortgages and have vacant houses and deserted farms subject to heavy taxes will gladly exchange places with the above-named owners of property whose holdings in the flood ways to be sold to the Federal Government at high prices will be less than 25 per cent of their holdings on the average, and in many cases will become a gold mine without local contribution.

Examine section 4 of the bill. It will stand close inspection because it was written by railway attorneys and inserted in both Senate and House bills without the change of a comma so far as I could determine, for I examined an original copy furnished members of the committees by a high railway official, and it protects the railway even if it does not protect the Government. That section, as heretofore stated, provides that when public service corporations—railways—change or relocate their tracks so as to take advantage of the complete flood control insured by the Government, the Government must pay all their costs of relocation and damages (?) unless "special" benefits can be shown.

RAILWAYS ESPECIALLY PROFIT

The railways are likely to be immune from any contribution under that proposal. Such prospective "damages" to the 11 railways in the valley from past floods were estimated by their engineers at $71,000,000, but will probably reach, in loss of business and actual injuries, to over $100,000,000. In the 1927 flood these roads stated to the committee their direct damages reached $6,318,000, which did not include losses in business and other like injuries.

Before the House committee the Illinois Central Railway engineer, Mr. Blaess, presented their case, as did ex-Senator Lorimer in the case of property owners, of whom he is one of many interested in the flood districts. These railways, Mr. Blaess, alleges, would present claims of $71,835,000 against the Government for relocation of their tracks, bridges, and so forth, to fit the plans for flood control. Protection to the railways from floods, protection to landowners, and increased business and profits because of flood control at Government expense does not enter into the equation. The roads want the money, and although the Illinois Central Railway has had the most profitable year, during 1927, of its existence, I am informed, no "special benefits," it is predicted, will be found to offset any part of Federal Government expenditures.

This railway charge of damages of possibly $100,000,000 against the Government is also considered in the minority report attached to these remarks.

OWNERSHIP OF 4,000,000 ACRES

In connection with the ownership of lands in the flood ways I have been furnished, at my request, a tabulation showing 265 corporations and 553 large owners of lands, each of whom have over a square mile—640 acres—in the flood ways, indicating three times that acreage on the average that will be protected outside the flood ways.

Other data that may be of interest on the same matter is herewith set forth.

NO STATES WITHOUT DEBTS

It has been urged that Southern States have suffered severely from floods and that they are entitled to special consideration from that fact. I am in sympathy with that argument to the extent of urging early prosecution of the flood-control plan and that provision of law requiring one-third contribution on the lower Mississippi River approved March 1, 1917, quoted in the former minority report attached hereto, should be waived or modified in all and every case where the locality can not assume any part of the burden even by a governmental loan, placing authority for such determination in the hands of responsible agencies of the Government. That can be provided in an amendment to the bill later to be offered.

The following debt comparison of six Northern States, however, and six Southern States speaks for itself. The per capita debt in the Northern States averages almost double that of the Southern States. To be absolutely fair this may be in part met by increased wealth per capita in the first six States, but without other data the facts presented indicate that if these States now to be exempt from contribution gave, like California, for a primarily local improvement that they would do only what other States are compelled to do. The comparison follows:

California, after its people have spent $100,000,000 on its Sacramento Valley, now offers to contribute two-thirds of the cost of the $51,000,000 additional improvement, of which the State government is to contribute $17,000,000, the valley residents an equal amount, and the Federal Government the remaining $17,000,000. California now has a State and local debt (Statistical Abstract, 1926, p. 220) reaching $16,582,000, based on last reports available, and the per capita indebtedness of $142.81 is more than double that of any of the States affected by floods in the lower Mississippi Valley. I am not offering any argument as to the injustice exercised toward California and its people beyond a brief statement of the facts existing in a country when every State must contribute its part of the tax for all public improvements and for any work that increases the holdings of the Mississippi Valley corporations and landowners hereinbefore named:

With this statement I attach the minority report to H. R. 8219, which, under the head of local contribution, discusses the situation presented by this bill and shows beyond cavil how unjust and unprecedented it is to undertake such a monstrous proposal for the Federal Government without requiring contribution from those well able to contribute. The minority report of 12 pages was buried between the 393 pages of the report submitted by Chairman REID with 142 pages preceding 239 pages following as an appendix. That part of the minority report signed by six Republican members of the committee which relates to "contributions" applies with equal force to the Senate bill as reported.

[House Report No. 1072, Seventieth Congress, first session]

MINORITY REPORT

From the Committee on Flood Control, House of Representatives, March 29, 1928. To accompany H. R. 8219

In presenting this minority report we desire to express entire agreement with our committee colleagues as to the importance of enacting into law a complete flood-control system for the lower Mississippi River from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico.

We submit, however, that the bill reported by the committee, in our judgment, is defective in the following particulars:

It offers no basis for a definite flood-control plan for the lower Mississippi River.

It delays the adoption of any definite flood-control plan until a complete study of the Mississippi watershed shall have been made by a newly created commission of seven members, a majority of whom may be unfamiliar with the Mississippi River problem.

It provides maximum flood-crest heights at Cairo, Arkansas City, and New Orleans, which heights have been arbitrarily and unwisely fixed without supporting evidence therefor.

It exempts from local contribution all cost of construction and maintenance of such control works without reference to local benefits, ability to contribute, eventual cost to the Federal Government, or existing law.

Detailed reasons for objections to these obvious defects in the bill are not here set forth, but we submit that—

After a period of practically three months of hearings at which 300 witnesses were heard, including civil and Army engineers, no semblance of a plan for flood control is provided by the bill. On the contrary, it provides for the appointment of a commission of seven members, who may be civil and Army engineers, which commission first is to begin and entirely complete a study of the entire Mississippi Valley watershed. A delay of a year or more is thereby threatened before any plan can be adopted for the lower Mississippi Valley.

ARMY OR CIVILIAN ENGINEERS

Nothing was presented or discussed in favor of a commission of seven members either by witnesses or in committee.

Over $1,000,000,000 have been expended by Army engineers on rivers and harbors without question raised as to their efficiency or honesty. For many years they and the Mississippi River Commission have studied the varying moods of the Mississippi and have a knowledge and experience that is invaluable at this present time. After hearing all witnesses, including many civilian engineers, the committee did not by its action adopt or consider any flood-control plan for the Mississippi River recommended by any civilian engineer. The civilian experts did not always agree with the Army engineers nor with each other, particularly when the interests of clients or localities conflicted.

The only plans before the committee during three months of hearings were those of the Mississippi River Commission, of which Colonel Potter, an Army engineer, is chairman, and the Jadwin plan, submitted by General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers. The Panama Canal was constructed under the direction of an Army engineer, so it would seem that this agency, at all times loyal to the General Government, should receive careful consideration from Congress.

IMPRACTICABLE GAUGE HEIGHTS

Flood-crest heights at Cairo, Arkansas City, and New Orleans have been fixed in the bill without any dependable information or competent testimony or any proper consideration by the committee. The following brief correspondence authoritatively expresses unanswerable objections to these gauge heights based on probable costs:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, February 16, 1928.

Maj. Gen. EDGAR JADWIN,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL JADWIN: The engineering testimony taken by our committee is not yet available, but it is my recollection that in addition to discussing the highest state of maximum floods to be prevented on the Mississippi River by your plan you gave estimates of increased costs if the flood crest was reduced at various points along the river.

I know different members of the committe believe your evidence to be very clear and definite on this point, and for that reason I am asking you to furnish me with a general estimate of the cost to the Federal Government, without contribution, if the maximum flood crest is reduced at Cairo to 54 feet, at Arkansas City to 58 feet, and at New Orleans to 19 feet.

These suggested flood heights, as I understand it, are reduced far below those recommended by the Mississippi River Commission and by your Board of Engineers as a safe maximum, and it is my impression that if the maximum flood crest is reduced to these figures the expense will be far in excess of the $296,000,000 estimate made by you for the complete flood-control works on the lower Mississippi.

An early answer, with estimated cost of the reduction to such maximum flood heights at the points designated, will be greatly appreciated.

Very respectfully,

W. F. KOPP.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1928.

Hon. W. F. KOPP,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KOPP: In reply to your letter of February 16, 1928, I will say that studies of the Mississippi problem soon made it clear to us that any attempt to restrain the flow line below the heights we used would be very expensive, if practicable at all.

In estimating the cost of holding the maximum flood crest down to 54 feet at Cairo, to 58 feet at Arkansas City, and to 19 feet at New Orleans we have used a combination of reservoirs and flood ways. The general estimate to accomplish this is about $1,400,000,000.

The above estimate is based on preliminary examinations which assume average conditions and average unit costs. When such an estimate gives a figure obviously beyond all reason as to expense the investigation is carried no further. If such a project should be seriously considered, it would be necessary to pursue the examination and make detailed surveys, borings, etc. With a mandate to hold the Mississippi River down to the stages referred to above, no responsible person could begin work without first spending considerable time—probably a year or more—making plans.

Sincerely yours,

EDGAR JADWIN,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

From the foregoing opinion of the Government's Chief Engineer it appears that the enormous sum of $1,400,000,000 will be required to provide gauge heights fixed by the bill or an average of $1,500,000 per mile of the lower river for occasional flood protection, "if practicable at all," in addition to all cost of revetment, which alone is estimated at over $100,000,000, and other costs for maintenance and river improvement for navigation.

It further appears from the Chief Engineer's letter that probably a year or more will be required by experts who are familiar with the Mississippi flood-control problem in making plans before construction work can begin.

LOCAL CONTRIBUTION

The bill provides that all flood-control improvements shall be paid by the Federal Government "without local contribution." Levees, flood ways, spillways, and all other control works constructed to protect cities in the flood-control area and millions of acres of alluvial lands are thus to be protected and benefited entirely at Federal expense.

This proposal against contribution goes beyond any plan yet offered for consideration. The Mississippi River Commission plan, Army engineers' plan, and other plans now before Congress, at least require donation of rights of way for river levees and one-third contribution according to existing law for levee building to present grade heights.

Complete protection will make flooded lands 100 per cent productive in the richest valley in the country. If any sector is unable to meet its contribution and is essential to the complete plan, the Federal Government, through proper agencies, can be authorized to advance money on such terms as would be warranted.

The Jadwin plan provided that flood ways or diversions like the Boeuf flood way of more than 1,000,000 acres shall be furnished to the Federal Government by the State. The committee bill requires that the Federal Government shall purchase or secure by condemnation this flood way and the Atchafalaya flood way and other lands in addition to construction of works.

Testimony before the committee is that in the proposed flood ways upward of 50 per cent of the land, or more, has had the valuable timber removed and is what is termed "cut-over land." This cut-over land in some places was valued at $75 an acre by witnesses. On these tracts it was stated an average indebtedness exists of about $30 per acre represented by drainage and levee bonds—bonds generally to be enhanced in value.

This land is located in ancient flood ways used by the river when overflowed prior to settlement. Other improved lands required for flood-protection purposes were estimated at far greater value.

Many large land and timber owners have interests that may properly be subject to contribution where benefited by complete flood protection as evidenced by the testimony of ex-Senator Lorimer, as follows:

"Mr. SEARS. Do I understand that you have some lands down there that will probably be overflowed lands?

"Mr. LORIMER. Yes, sir.

"Mr. SEARS. * * * What is the future of these lands in case it is dedicated to overflow purposes?

"Mr. LORIMER. If there was no break in the levees, no backwater * * * they would have the same value as the same sort of lands in the Delta."

This bill will give complete flood protection so as to stabilize the levee and drainage bond market and furnish through the Government a cash customer for several times present values of land. Flood-way rights subject to overflow at intervals of from 2 to 14 years, depending on location, may thus cost the Federal Government upward of $150,000,000, according to the liberality of local condemnation tribunals.

Other questions of equal or greater importance require definite authoritative information of which Congress should have knowledge before determining matters of contribution hereinafter referred to.

For example, a claim for damages against the Federal Government that may properly have equal equities with the timber company cut-over lands was offered by the testimony of several railway engineers.

RAILWAY DAMAGE CLAIMS

Mr. A. F. Blaess, chief engineer of the Illinois Central Railway Co., furnished the committee with an itemized estimate of damages that he contended will affect 11 railways in the valley due to a proposed readjustment of the several roads to new grades and other expenditures occasioned by the Jadwin flood-control plan.

The engineers all contended with surprising unanimity that the Mississippi flood-control problem is not only national in its scope but that all future damages occasioned by the flood-control plans to railways or other private property should be paid for by the Federal Government. (Pp. 3777 to 3778, and many other pages of the hearings.)

The future railway damages that the Government is expected to pay were estimated at $71,835,000. The testimony further disclosed that the Illinois Central Co.'s damage during the 1927 flood reached $6,318,000 (p. 3779). To secure complete flood protection for this railway, in addition to all other flood-control expenditures, the Government will thus pay to the Illinois Central Co. for railway changes $16,400,000, although the road's gross earnings for 1927 were stated to be $190,000,000.

GOVERNMENT EXPENSE WITHOUT LOCAL CONTRIBUTION

No effort is here made to estimate the exact cost of lower Mississippi River flood protection either by the committee plan or the Jadwin plan or the Mississippi River Commission plan, if without contribution. With limited contribution the commission offered a partial-relief plan for $407,000,000 and for complete control an estimate of $775,000,000. The Jadwin plan of $296,400,000 if constructed entirely at Government expense may reach over a half billion dollars, while the House committee plan at gauge heights fixed in the bill will cost around $1,500,000,000 as shown by the engineer's estimate.

To overestimate the cost is to be subjected to merited criticism, but to underestimate the proposed expense or seek to deceive ourselves by omitting or ignoring necessary items that must be paid is folly without parallel.

If with this lower Mississippi financial problem to be faced Congress is prepared to have the Federal Government assume full payment, together with an estimated annual maintenance charge of $6,000,000, then the next step will be to determine on what basis contribution will be required for flood-control works on possibly a thousand other streams, large and small, when carried in an omnibus bill. The public building waste and omnibus method of legislation became a public scandal that has been recently abandoned, due in part to the public condemnation of such unbusinesslike methods.

Brief consideration of the flood-control field will disclose possibilities for unlimited expenditures through the omnibus system of legislation. The immediate importance of this fact relates to the plan of local contribution if any to be here adopted, in view of existing law.

FLOOD CONTROL BILLS

River and harbor projects, some of which now require local contribution are first recommended to Congress by Army engineers. These engineers under existing committee rules must approve all projects for purposes of navigation before they are reported by the committee. Over 80 per cent of the proposed navigation projects introduced and supported by Representatives in Congress have been rejected in the past by these engineers because unworthy of improvement. That rule protects the Government against improper expenditures however strongly urged by localities.

A difference exists with flood control where no report by the Army engineers binds the committee or Congress. Based upon bills now before the Flood Control Committee, streams of insignificant size not capable of improvement for navigation or with any Federal interest involved may be embodied if so determined by the committee in an omnibus bill.

The field is all-comprehensive. Army engineers are not required to pass upon the commercial values of any flood-control improvement, although the statute requires an examination before adoption. Ordinarily witnesses for flood control before congressional committees are directly or indirectly interested in securing Federal construction of their project.

Among the 300 witnesses heard on the lower Mississippi River flood-control project, apart from the Army engineers representing the Government, practically all advocated that the entire flood-control work constructed on that river and other rivers should be at Federal expense—a natural frame of mind with interested parties.

Eventually the cost of flood-control work, power, irrigation, and associated water uses, if once initiated at Federal expense, may reach beyond the wildest estimates, for if included in regular omnibus bills with a possible project in every State, the force will then be irresistible. If no Treasury surplus is available, such expenditures will be covered by bond issues as proposed by bills now pending before the committee.

FLOOD-WAY SERVITUDE

For untold centuries the lower Mississippi has carried off the waters of many States. During a full century the people living in the great Mississippi River Valley settled on these alluvial lands subject to overflow and floods. They drained the swamps and built levees entirely at their own expense, without Government help. Under the swamp land act they were enabled to buy these lands at nominal cost. In 1917 Congress by law agreed to contribute two-thirds of all moneys expended for levee construction.

The flood servitude has ever existed and the flood ways recommended by Army engineers are through these ancient natural diversion channels. The Federal Government has thus far expended about $190,000,000 for navigation and flood control on the lower Mississippi River and a further sum of $100,000,000 for river-bank revetment is to be expended under the direction of Army engineers irrespective of any separate bill for flood control, although it will be part of the flood-control system.

AN UNPRECEDENTED PARADOX

It must be remembered that a large part of the land in the Mississippi Valley, by local interests now asked to be protected by the Federal Government entirely at Federal Government expense, once belonged to the Federal Government. Thereafter a strange cycle of exploitation followed. In order to drain swamp areas in the valley, the Federal Government gave swamp lands to the several States to be sold at $1.25 an acre. Such lands were frequently highly valuable because of heavy natural timber growth, and curiously some of that land lies in districts where diversion channels are now planned through old natural flood ways to aid in the control of present-day occasional floods. Under the provisions of the committee bill the lands so given away by the Federal Government and so sold by the States at $1.25 an acre, now that the valuable timber has been removed, are to be sold back to the Federal Government at a cost of $75 an acre for cut-over lands—without contribution. So says the committee bill.

1. In recommending Mississippi flood-control work, President Coolidge in his message to Congress said:

"Under the present law the land adjacent to the dikes has paid one-third of the cost of their construction. This has been a most extraordinary concession from the plan adopted in relation to irrigation, where the general rule has been that the land benefited should bear the entire expense. It is true, of course, that the troublesome waters do not originate on the land to be reclaimed, but it is also true that such waters have a right of way through that section of the country and the land there is charged with that easement. It is the land of this region that is to be benefited. To say that it is unable to bear any expense of reclamation is the same thing as saying that it is not worth reclaiming."

2. Later the President, transmitting to Congress letter from Secretary of War Davis and report of Chief Engineer Jadwin, said:

"It is axiomatic that States and other local authorities should supply all lands and assume all pecuniary responsibility for damages that may result from the execution of the project. It would be revolutionary for the Federal Government to establish the precedent of buying part of the land upon which to build protective works to increase the value of the remainder. Similarly it would be very unwise for the United States in generously helping a section of the country to render itself liable for consequential damages.

"The Government may even bear 80 per cent of such cost, but substantial local cooperation is essential to avoid waste.

"It would seem that the States should share with the Federal Government the burden of assisting the levee districts and individual property owners, especially in view of the fact that the States benefit directly by the increased taxes from land made more valuable by reason of its protection."

General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, has recommended modification of local contribution of from one-third to one-fifth or 20 per cent of the cost of the Mississippi River flood control in addition to a donation of needed rights of way and flood ways before the Government proceed with the general construction of flood control.

The Secretary of War also proposed that where localities for any reason may be unable to contribute because of existing debt burdens, that the Government might loan to such districts or communities for a period of 20 years at low rates of interest the amount of their local contribution so required, and that such loan be used in advancing to completion the flood-control area.

An additional safeguard against serious delay or failure in construction of any essential part of the project was provided by authorizing the commission or constructing agency, when failure might otherwise result, to exempt from such contribution any interests, particularly where no substantial benefits would accrue to them.

It is submitted that before any such action can be taken, definite facts should be placed before Congress, and the officials authorized to act in relation to the matter of contribution.

Witnesses heard by the committee, in some cases representing large landowners and other interests alleged not to be unselfish, repeatedly portrayed flood conditions and the distress of small property owners. It has also been alleged that lobbyists representing large business interests owning property in the valley, aided by influential press agencies and other propaganda, have sought to impress upon Congress cases of distress that properly excite sympathy.

Congress should relieve such cases with or without contribution, as may seem necessary, and without hesitation or delay, but Congress should act intelligently and not permit private interests alleged to be cloaked behind this distress to raid the Federal Treasury.

The existing law, approved March 1, 1917, provides for controlling the floods of the Mississippi River from the Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, and contains a carefully considered provision by Congress enacted at the time, as follows:

"(b) That no money appropriated under authority of this section shall be expended in the construction or repair of any levee unless and until assurances have been given, satisfactory to the commission, that local interests protected thereby will contribute for such construction and repair a sum which the commission shall determine to be just and equitable, but which shall not be less than one-half of such sum as may have been allotted by the commission for such work: Provided, That such contributions shall be expended under the direction of the commission, or in such manner as it may require or approve, but no contribution made by any State or levee district shall be expended in any other State or levee district except with the approval of the authorities of the State or district so contributing."

In order to insure cooperation by the State to be benefited by such flood protection undertaken by the Federal Government, paragraph (d) further provides:

"(d) No money appropriated under authority of this act shall be expended in payment for any right of way for any levee which may be constructed in cooperation with any State or levee district under authority of this act, but all such rights of way shall be provided free of cost to the United States: Provided, That no money paid or expense incurred by any State or levee district in securing such rights of way, or in any temporary works of emergency during an impending flood, or for the maintenance of any levee line, shall be computed as a part of the contribution of such State or levee district toward the construction or repair of any levee within the meaning of paragraph (b) of this section."

To provide unbiased and authentic information on which Congress could base legislation, the flood control act further provided a prerequisite to any particular flood-control legislation, as follows:

"SEC. 3. * * * In consideration of all works and projects relating to flood control which may be submitted to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors for consideration and recommendation, said board shall, in addition to any other matters upon which it may be required to report, state its opinions as to (a) what Federal interest, if any, is involved in the proposed improvement; (b) what share of the expense, if any, should be borne by the United States; and (c) the advisability of adopting the project."

Inversely stated, Congress has determined upon the advisability of adopting some project for the control of the Mississippi River. The 1927 flood and past congressional action has saved any necessity for examination as to the "advisability" other than the particular project which is yet to be adopted. The law requiring contribution is proposed to be changed by the bill without any effort to have a financial survey of the lands or of landowners and other interests to be protected or to determine "what share of the expense, if any, should be borne by the United States."

Practically all witnesses called before the committee were interested in having complete flood-control works furnished by the Federal Government, and with equal unanimity all agreed that all expenses for any and every flood-control purpose should be paid by the Federal Government without contribution from local interests to be benefited.

We submit that any proposed expenditure involving hundreds of millions of dollars of Federal funds, primarily for private protection, necessarily will enormously increase property values of lands and bonds held as security against said property, and that Congress should have reliable data, as provided by law, in order to determine "what share of the expense, if any, should be borne by the United States" and those benefited.

FACTS BEFORE CONGRESS

Responsibility for such determination in all cases is an obligation placed on Congress before any decision can be reached intelligently to determine what share of the expense should be borne by the Federal Government and what share by the States and private interests to be benefited.

To determine such question for property on both sides of 1,000 miles of the Mississippi River without any definite information on which to act and prior to the adoption of any specific plan is to place public interests secondary to a sentiment in part created by a systematic powerful propaganda. The possibilities of propaganda apart from personal contact, news editorials, and other forms familiar to members is evidenced by the testimony of Mr. Brylawski, pages 4107 and 4108 of hearings. After submitting resolutions adopted at Columbus, he said: "I represent the Picture Owners of America; I am chairman of its board of directors."

"Gentlemen, that is the form of the language of the resolution. What it really means is this, that the Theater Owners of America, controlling some 17,000 screens for the purpose of disseminating any propaganda that you might deem desirable to the people of the United States at such times as you may think it desirable, our idea being that when this measure comes up on the floor of Congress, should this committee think it would be a proper thing to do, we are prepared to run in the theaters special films showing the work of control, possibly conveying some idea of what you propose to do, and to carry that message to the American public so that it may, if possible, swing the sentiment and votes to you in your efforts * * *.

"Mr. MAJOR. What do you mean by propaganda?

"Mr. BRYLAWSKI. Bringing it out before the public. We think the public is prone to forget, and our idea in using the word 'propaganda'—the word is my own—would be possibly carrying a message if necessary to write their Congressmen and express their sentiment on this work."

Necessity for flood relief, and relief without delay, is certain, but it should not be made a vehicle for huge profits by financial interests to be benefited in land sales, improved land values, and otherwise by such control works without any contribution by localities benefited.

A proposed amendment for a financial survey of the Mississippi Valley flood district was heretofore rejected by the committee. Again it is urged for reason briefly stated as follows:

THE NEED OF A PRELIMINARY ECONOMIC SURVEY

H. R. 8219 fails to provide for an economic survey of the lower Mississippi area, to determine in advance what local contributions, if any, should be required. Local contributions have hitherto been the rule. In view of the vastness of the 1927 flood, and the great disaster which resulted therefrom, the feeling of Congress and of the country has been generous in the extreme with respect to the suffering and loss of the inhabitants of the alluvial Delta from Cairo to the Gulf. There is no disposition anywhere to drive a hard bargain or to insist upon a burdensome local contribution. There is a disposition, however, on the part of many, which will grow as the American people come to understand the soundness of it, to maintain in a reasonable manner the principle of local self-help, to prevent countless flood and tributary and reservoir enterprises which will hereafter arise from taking an unfair advantage of this present mighty burst of national feeling about the Mississippi catastrophe. It may reasonably be argued that there is a special benefit which will accrue to the lower Mississippi area from the perfected project under the proposed act. It would seem likely that the income from the cotton fields, for example, would be more continuous and the acreage more widely extended if there is adequate protection from even a superflood. It would appear that the realty values in the towns and villages and cities in that fertile Delta will rise in the next quarter of a century, as the result of perfect security, to heights which would not have been reached otherwise. There appears to be a special benefit as well as a general benefit. If this is true, then the principles of the special assessment should be applied to the financing of this project.

But under all the circumstances of this particular problem this theory is questioned by many. It is held that the project has reached the stage of becoming entirely national, and that the construction and administration, the maintenance and the obligation are, and of a right ought to be, wholly with the Federal Government. It is maintained that the alluvial Delta has paid to the limit until it can pay no more. It is held that the equities of burden as between the States are so uncertain, and under the project become so unreasonable, that the only solution is the Federal payment of the whole bill.

FACTS, NOT EMOTION, NEEDED FOR INTELLIGENT ACTION

The truth about these opposed contentions can not be determined by emotion or sympathy or desire but by facts determined on the spot. Nobody now has the facts. The Federal Government has a right to know about these things. Congress has no right to appropriate these vast sums until it knows about these things. On the economic side the report of the Army engineers is only an approximation. It does not pretend to be anything more. For example, the Army engineers estimate the flowage damages on the Birds Point and New Madrid flood way at three and one-half millions. The estimate of Mr. Berthe, the engineer of the levee district near Cairo, is eighteen millions. They are miles apart. Who is right? The country, the Delta, the Congress have a right to know. There is some testimony before the committee that land in the Yazoo Valley is worth only $40 an acre. Other witnesses testified it is worth at least $100 an acre. Who is right? It makes a difference in the amount of contribution or burden which the land might conceivably and reasonably still carry.

And the proposed great flood ways down the Boeuf and the Atchafalaya.

Why should the territory of Arkansas and Louisiana be utilized to provide vast flood ways of safety and pay the entire local share of the burden, when the State of Mississippi gets a large share of the benefit? What, if anything, should Mississippi pay, provided Arkansas and Louisiana pay?

INCREASED VALUES THROUGH PROTECTION

It ought to be known, too, what the real value of the property is that is to be protected if you are going to tax against it; railways, cities, towns, agriculture land, cleared, cut over, swamp, timber land. The land should be classified to determine how far the values are sufficient to warrant the cost of full protection; and in the case of lands that are not, how far they will be injured or benefited by partial protection. What compensation is just to any areas which will be given less protection than at the present time? The assessed values of different classes of land and their relation to actual values; what is it going to cost to protect these values? Should not the land be classified, and the worthless which can bear nothing, separated from the productive which can bear something? Will not the railways in the protected areas be better off? In the course of the years will not the real property values in the towns and villages and cities rise higher than the normal increment would carry them, because of the security afforded them by a perfected flood-control project? If the real as well as the personal, the tangible as well as the intangible values are sure ultimately to rise hopefully upon the completion of the project, what should be the method of distribution of local contribution?

Should there be a moratorium period? If those who are to be benefited can not pay anything now, can they pay something later, when the increment of value accrues to them? In what proportion should expenditures of each kind—damage, flowage, rights of way, construction costs—be borne? Should the United States defer the local payments, guarantee local bonds, itself take the bonds? Who owns the land? Who owns the bonds of the levee districts? What is the financial status of the levee districts? What do intensive studies at typical points reveal as to the real income, the real profit, the real productiveness, the real taxable capacity of the land? What is the relation between the amount of money the people in the Mississippi Delta have already spent upon levees to the benefits which they have all the time received in return? Is it more or less? And approximately how much? In the long range of the years, when the levee line could be relatively low, was there really a very great burden upon the land and production? In the more recent years, when the height of the levee line and the necessary breadth and strength of the levee have for a variety of reasons become much greater, greater than the localities could reasonably construct or maintain or pay largely toward constructing and maintaining, should not some credit be given for this onerous increment of burden? And how much? Are the tentative financial recommendations of the various bills to be regarded as a precedent for flood-control works in the Mississippi Valley or in the United States generally?

And finally, is it nature or the Nation which is responsible for the great Mississippi floods? And if both, how much of each? How much is due to original topography and how much to modern drainage?

How can questions like these, which are vital to the fair and just solution of the Mississippi flood-control problem on its financial side, be answered except by an economic survey by competent persons? How can Congress settle questions of equitable burden like these by guessed-at percentages or slapstick financial sections inserted in a bill? Congress and the Government of the United States have a right to know these things. The people of the Delta are as loyal citizens as can be found in the country. They are not afraid of the facts. They have no wish to embarrass the Government for the future.

PROPOSALS FOR ECONOMIC SURVEY

Any Mississippi flood control bill should authorize an immediate economic survey and should have in it provisions similar to the following:

"The commission shall report to the President on or before November 15, 1928, its recommendations as to the share which should in equity be borne by the United States, by the several States affected, and by other agencies, of the costs of the engineering work entering into the adopted project, and of any costs or damages necessary to or arising out of the execution of the project; and as to the manner and mode by which such States or other agencies should meet the costs or contributions, if any, which would thus devolve on them. In making its recommendation the commission shall give consideration to the actual and relative benefits accruing from the project to the Nation and to the several States and localities affected; to the value of the territory in said alluvial valley; to the probable effect of the adoption of its recommendations, as a precedent in the future consideration of flood-control problems elsewhere in the country; and to other pertinent aspects of the economic problems involved. The aforesaid report shall be transmitted by the President to the Congress at its next session."

And nothing above contained should be construed as delaying the vigorous prosecution, under direction of the flood commission or of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, of essential works of flood control. The survey need not delay the prosecution of the project a single day.

CONCLUSION

We believe full authority should be given the agency selected to provide plans and execute them. For that reason no maximum gauge heights as contained in the bill should be fixed by Congress.

An economic survey by Government agencies should be made at once to determine local benefits contribution where warranted and a provision for loans by the Government when advisable or exemptions from payment where necessary to the execution of a comprehensive plan of flood control.

Repairs to levees and raising to the established grade with protected river revetment, all part of every proposed flood-control plan, should be continued without delay.

A Trojan warrior who has stood firm in his protection of the Government Treasury is the distinguished chairman of the great Appropriations Committee, MARTIN MADDEN. He is not in physical condition to take active part in this discussion that is about to involve the Federal Government in a billion-dollar expenditure for one project, but with a clear vision of what it means and what is to follow Mr. MADDEN made a statement for publication that can not be overlooked, coming from such a distinguished authority.

I quote his opinion of the former bill which is practically the same in many particulars as the Jones bill passed by the Senate and now before the House:

MADDEN VISIONS FIVE-BILLION COST IN FLOOD CONTROL—SAYS STATES SHOULD PAY SHARE

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 18 (Special).—Five billion dollars may be the ultimate cost to the United States of flood-control projects throughout the country if Congress approves the Reid bill, Representative MARTIN B. MADDEN (Representative, Illinois), chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations said to-day.

Representative MADDEN indicated his intention to fight to the finish for the administration flood-control plan under which local communities would share the cost and against the establishment of the principle of the Reid bill placing complete responsibility upon the Federal Government.

WOULD COST BILLIONS

While the Reid bill as approved by the House Flood Control Committee authorizes the appropriation of $473,000,000 and applies specifically only to the lower Mississippi, Mr. MADDEN asserted that the declaration for full Federal responsibility would pave the way for other projects costing the Government billions.

Mr. MADDEN estimated that the land required for rights of way, which under the administration plan would be furnished by local communities but which under the Reid bill would be paid for by the Federal Government, would cost in excess of $100,000,000, and that the payment of flood damages which the Reid bill similarly shifts from local governments to the national would mean hundreds of millions in addition.

"There are six States—New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Ohio, New Jersey, and Illinois—which ordinarily pay about 80 per cent of all the cost of the Federal Government," Mr. MADDEN said. "None of these States is asking for any money for flood control within their own borders. Yet under the proposal in the Reid bill these States would be required to pay 80 per cent of the cost of flood control on the lower Mississippi.

WHAT ILLINOIS WOULD PAY

"Illinois ordinarily pays about one-tenth of the cost of running the Government, which means that if flood-control projects ultimately cost $5,000,000,000, Illinois's share will be half a million. New York State would have to pay 25 per cent, or a billion and a quarter.

"Is there any reason why a few States which may never want Federal assistance to guard against floods, each of which has sufficient resources to meet their own needs, should assume a perpetual obligation to meet the obligations of other States while the other States are not even asked to contribute to their own welfare? The question answers itself.

"It is true that the people of the South have suffered and are entitled to assistance to the extent that assistance can properly be given. I am in favor of the Federal Government's making a contribution of part of the cost of flood control on the lower Mississippi as proposed in the Jadwin plan. But I want it to be understood as a voluntary contribution by the Government and not as establishing the principle that the Federal Government assumes complete responsibility."

An official of the Government whose oath of office to support the Constitution is interpreted to include a guardianship of the Nation's strong box has also expressed his opinion of the Jones bill. That obligation rests equally on every Member of Congress, but sometimes when personal or political interests conflict with plain duty we follow the crowd. Lest we forget:

[From the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., April 3, 1928]

PRESIDENT SCORES JONES FLOOD BILL—FEELS MEASURE DOES NOT SPECIFICALLY SET FORTH EXPENDITURES

President Coolidge feels that the Jones flood control bill, approved by the Senate and now before the House, is open to criticism because the expenditures it would authorize for protecting the Mississippi River from further disasters are not specifically set forth.

The bill makes it impossible, in the President's judgment, to say how much flood control will cost.

Senator JONES himself, Mr. Coolidge remembers, in reporting his bill to the Senate, admitted that the final expense in completing the flood-control work would be far above $700,000,000. This shows a great discrepancy with the $325,000,000 estimate which Maj. Gen. Edgar Jadwin thought adequate for completing satisfactory flood-relief plans.

In addition to Senator JONES, Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina, also estimated that the final task of flood-relief measures as outlined in the Jones measure would vastly exceed the $325,000,000 which the bill carries now. One other Senator estimated that it would cost at least $1,000,000,000.

Nothing has occurred in the flood-control situation to change the views of President Coolidge which he expressed in his annual message to Congress and subsequently in the press. Pending final action of the House on the Jones bill, President Coolidge is having this measure carefully investigated to determine its good and bad points with a view to securing to it such amendments as may appear necessary in his estimation.

This opinion by the Nation's Chief Executive was not expressed alone several months ago, but apparently within 24 hours was repeated in last night's Star.

Objections to the bill could be pointed out to the President that merit its defeat, but I have directed all criticisms in these remarks to the one outstanding injustice and unholy league between prospective tributaries that permit a $1,000,000,000 drain on the Federal Treasury without any contribution from those enormously benefited by flood protection.

With the foregoing facts hurriedly prepared, but valuable for reference purposes, I add that Mr. MADDEN's prediction of eventual cost is based on solid ground. Any action excusing local contribution will be urged in all future projects as a precedent.

It was repeatedly urged before the committee by witnesses who hold no responsible relations to the Government. It was urged as a general policy by Members of Congress and others who under an omnibus bill collecting in projects from all over the country will make the fattest pork barrel in past history look sylphlike in proportions when confronted with possibilities invited by the real article.

Two paragraphs from Senate bill S. 819 show the attitude of distinguished Senators who would go the limit, according to the provisions of their bills. The Senator gave his testimony before the House committee. I quote from his bill that appropriates $1,000,000,000:

SPECIAL POWERS OF COMMISSION

(1) To take over and assume control of all levees and other flood-control works, and works of improvement upon and along the Mississippi River, its tributaries, inlets, and outlets now being maintained by any agency of the Federal Government.

(2) To take over and assume control of all levees and other flood-control works and works of improvement under the jurisdiction of any State, county, levee district, or other local agency, if such State, county, levee district, or other local agency so requests the commission, and the commission deems it advisable so to do; and to reimburse any such State, county, levee district, or other local agency for any moneys advanced or funds expended in the construction of any such works, to assume the outstanding indebtedness incurred in the construction thereof, or to make such other arrangement with respect thereto as may be agreed upon by the commission with such State, county, levee district, or other local agency.

I am only stating the proposal without argument to indicate the tendency of flood-control legislation to "reimburse" all local payments in addition to striking down anything that bars the way to an unprecedented onslaught on the Federal Treasury.

THE JONES BILL PASSED BY THE SENATE

The bill just quoted is not followed to the same extreme by the Jones bill, now reported for House action. When before the Senate the RECORD of Senate proceedings indicates the character of the discussion. Generous bouquets were handed out in that old historic legislative Chamber, in which delicate "forget-me-nots" were profusely scattered. Only by reading the RECORD can a full understanding of the situation be had in the hour given to a discussion of the bill appropriating a thousand million dollars.

These proceedings are found in the House report on the Jones bill and are illuminating. Any deliberative or thorough analysis of different provisions of the bill there lacking evidence the exact amount of time and care given by this great legislative body to an unprecedented measure reaching upward of a billion dollars as stated, which, under all rules of procedure, past practice, and the Constitution, should properly originate in the House.

Thoughtful consideration is shown when a distinguished speaker, in response to an inquiry, answered that the project might cost anywhere from $700,000,000 to far more than that amount, which was the reason we may infer why only $325,000,000 was inserted in the bill. This painstaking effort not to get within gunshot of the actual cost reminds one of the historical incident when Tell placed an apple on his boy's head with the memorable remark, "All for one and one for all." Only this difference exists that apple sauce besprinkled with granulated tributary sugar stood for the last mark to be shot at. Read the report.

When the Senate bill came before our committee I modestly offered to double the Senate appropriation either to seven or eight hundred million dollars, so that it might in some slight degree approximate a correct understanding of the Government expenditure involved.

This was opposed on the theory that stigmatism, cataract, or complete blindness is more fully covered by colored glasses than by exposing such sad misfortunes to the vulgar gaze. In like manner the vision of no Congressman need be disturbed by the amount involved in the Senate bill as it passed the Senate or was reported by the House committee. Righteous indignation might cause some taxpayer to demand to know why in both Senate and House a misleading amount has been inserted without expert advice unusual with those charged with legislative duties. I make no comment beyond a statement of facts that invite close scrutiny of a bill in many other particulars than are here indicated.

CONGRESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR RESULTS

White House visitors have repeatedly reflected their personal views when alleging that President Coolidge has changed his position on contributions as first announced in his message to Congress.

In contradiction appear occasional reports that the Government's Chief Executive has not changed. Nothing has since been presented to warrant his support of a bill that gives away large slices of wealth to private interests at Treasury expense.

I have not heard directly nor indirectly, nor do I believe it is any concern of Congress what action President Coolidge may take on this bill if it reaches him in its present form. No man can disguise the effect on the country's finances, invited by no contribution. Every project hereafter will have behind its supporters enough cupidity to demand and often secure the same consideration. Few measures in time of peace have ever been before Congress that involved the approval of such an unwarranted and suicidal financial policy.

Congress has evaded responsibility in another legislative body and it is possible we may do the same here, thus permitting grasping interests to make enormous profits on land of little value and vastly enhancing the value of other property that will be raised to fabulous figures if the Government buys in order to protect the lives of local people. Adjoining land similarly situated will be a mine of wealth to the owners after the bill's passage with the Treasury vaults for that gold mine.

Whatever the attitude of the Executive may be—and he is no more responsible for Treasury protection than every individual Senator and Representative—I believe when the facts are known, as they could be made known by a vigorous Executive message demanding contribution from those able to pay, that the country would support such action and it might help to stiffen the backbone of those who are moved by different considerations to go with the crowd and thus scuttle the Treasury.

I hope a Mississippi River flood control measure will pass and give early relief to those in real distress or possible future danger; but if this bill passes the House without any effort to compel local contribution by those able to contribute, I hope the bill will get what it invites and richly deserves—a veto.

Predictions are not dangerous as to what would follow, for if a flood control bill was likely to fail unless an honest attempt was made to protect the Government from influences now hiding behind the skirts of national sympathy, then the interests most concerned would hold responsible for failure those who for selfish interests are holding out against reasonable contribution.

All have their individual responsibilities, and I have endeavored to present for your consideration manifold reasons why the Jones bill as at present written should be defeated.

An estimate received from the engineers' office at my request has computed the Federal Government's expenditure under the bill at costs of acquiring land at $25, $50, and $75 an acre. The latter figure was declared to be a fair figure for cut-over land by one witness, so was submitted as a probable cost fixed by partial juries.

THE VARIOUS ESTIMATES ARE PRESENTED

Costs that may develop from the Jones bill

	Land in large flood ways at $75 per acre	Land in large flood ways at $50 per acre	Land in large flood ways at $25 per acre
Army engineer project	$296,400,000	$296,400,000	$296,400,000
All rights of way and drainage, plus flowage and damages, Bonnet Carre and Bayou Des Glaizes loop	11,500,000	11,500,000	11,500,000
Land, damages, etc., Birds Point-New Madrid flood way as estimated by local people (Mr. Reid)	18,500,000	18,500,000	18,500,000
Boeuf and Atchafalaya flood ways (3,713,696 acres at $75, $50, and $25 per acre)	278,600,000	185,700,000	92,900,000
Railroad claims estimated by railroad chief engineers' committee (see p. 146, report of Chairman Frank R. Reid, flood control in the Mississippi Valley, March, 1928)	71,800,000	71,800,000	71,800,000
Highway claims if allowed	11,500,000	11,500,000	11,500,000
Masonry spillways if substituted by board	54,000,000	54,000,000	54,000,000
Additional freeboard of 4 feet if substituted by board	167,000,000	167,000,000	167,000,000
Atchafalaya revetments (Mississippi River Commission)	4,500,000	4,500,000	4,500,000
Total	913,800,000	820,900,000	728,100,000
From the surveys of tributaries authorized there may develop tributary and upper river work far exceeding $86,000,000 (estimate for parts affected by backwater). The total will be dependent upon local contributions and rights-of-way payments adopted	86,000,000	86,000,000	86,000,000
Grand total	999,800,000	906,900,000	814,100,000

From the survey authorized from Baton Rouge to Cape Girardeau there may develop a reservoir project which would substitute $1,500,000,000 for the above. The estimated assessed value of the lands in the large flood ways is $25 per acre, or about $92,900,000.

COVE CREEK

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement about the value of Cove Creek in the development of the Tennessee River.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement as indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement about the value of Cove Creek in the development of the Tennessee River:

THE WHY OF COVE CREEK

Downstream, near where the Tennessee River rushes from the last bench land and there turns itself from a stream of fast fall and rapid flow into a slow-moving lowland river, is Muscle Shoals.

Once they take the final leap from the bench land, the waters of the Tennessee River have no power potentialities. The water is just water, and in flood time is more of curse than blessing.

Near Paducah, Ky., the Tennessee River empties into the Ohio River. It would be better to say that the Ohio empties into the Tennessee. For the annual flow of the Tennessee is greater than that of the Ohio.

The flow of the Tennessee is irregular, erratic. At times it is a raging torrent, emptying into the Ohio a flood that later comes down the Mississippi to threaten the peace of those who live behind the levees. At times the Tennessee is so reluctant in flow that the stream bed mostly is sand bar.

For effective operation, a hydroelectric plant is no bigger than the smallest flow of water through the generating turbines. At Muscle Shoals the range in this flow is tremendous.

In flood season the flow is such that Muscle Shoals could generate a million horsepower of electric current, had it the equipment. In low season there is speculation if Muscle Shoals can generate 100,000 horsepower. Some estimate it as low as 75,000 horsepower.

What is true of Muscle Shoals is true of all other actual and potential power sites along the Tennessee River. There is at all plants a staggering difference between high and low flow.

This is where Cove Creek comes in.

Up toward the head source of the watershed is Cove Creek. At a cost of perhaps $38,000,000, it is proposed to build there a dam. The primary purpose of this dam would not be the development of power at Cove Creek. The primary purpose would be to regulate the flow of water down the river.

Experts representing the National Power & Light Co. have stated that, if Cove Creek Dam is built, Muscle Shoals will be assured an even flow of water to guarantee continuous generation of 600,000 horsepower instead of the present minimum of 100,000 or less.

These figures seem wide but all agree that the building of a dam at Cove Creek would at least double the constant power generated at Muscle Shoals.

It would do more. It would increase by two-fold or more the power possibilities of all the privately owned hydroelectric projects between Cove Creek and Muscle Shoals.

Cove Creek Dam would stabilize water flow in the Tennessee River. This would serve to lessen flood damage along the Tennessee, Ohio, and Mississippi Rivers. It would, too, generate its own power during the seasons of the year when water would be let out of Cove Creek to feed the downstream power units.

Uncle Sam proposes to develop Muscle Shoals and at the same time to take from the Power Trust the development of Cove Creek. And he proposes that since the building of Cove Creek Dam will so greatly increase the production possibilities of power companies below Cove Creek that the companies benefited shall pay a small fee for the benefit. At which the private company to-day rises to howl.

Do you think they have a just howl?

STONE MOUNTAIN

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk Senate Concurrent Resolution 13 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONFERENCE REPORT—BRIDGE ACROSS THE CHESAPEAKE BAY

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the conference report on Senate bill 1498, an act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Chesapeake Bay, and to fix the location of said bridge. This conference report has been pending for some time, and I have been trying to get it up, but various things have interfered.

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1498) entitled "An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Chesapeake Bay, and to fix the location of said bridge," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1498) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Chesapeake Bay, and to fix the location of said bridge, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and embodied in the accompanying conference report, namely:

The Senate bill is an act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Chesapeake Bay, as authorized by an act of Congress passed during the Sixty-ninth Congress. The original act, by general language, fixed the location of the bridge. The Senate bill, in addition to extending the time for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge, also fixed a definite location for the bridge. Ordinarily bridge bills do not definitely fix the location of bridges. They ordinarily provide that the bridge may be constructed "at or near" a certain location, leaving it to the Chief of Engineers, who approves the plans, to fix the exact location of the bridge in the interests of navigation.

For that reason the House amended the Senate bill by striking out the section of the Senate bill providing for a definite location of the bridge.

At the conference it was ascertained that the location authorized in the original act was not quite broad enough to permit the bridge to be built at the particular place where the Chief of Engineers was willing to grant approval for its construction. Therefore it was thought advisable, in extending the time for beginning and completing the construction of the bridge, to also fix definitely the location of the bridge as agreed upon with the Chief of Engineers.

In view of that condition the managers on the part of the House receded from its amendments to the Senate bill and agreed to the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

CONFERENCE REPORT—BRIDGE BILLS

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the conference reports on the following bills:

H. R. 9137, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River on the Lebanon-Hartsville road in Wilson and Trousdale Counties, Tenn.; H. R. 9147, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Tennessee River on the Jasper-Chattanooga road in Marion County, Tenn.; H. R. 9197, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Knoxville-Maryville road in Knox County, Tenn.; H. R. 9198, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Paris-Dover road in Henry and Stewart Counties, Tenn.; and H. R. 9199, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River on the Dover-Clarksville road in Stewart County, Tenn.

Mr. Speaker, if I may add just a word here, I think it will save reading the statements. These are bridge bills giving the consent of Congress to build bridges in the State of Tennessee. They all involve the same question. The bills had to go to conference on account of a peculiar law which was passed by the Legislature of Tennessee. It was thought wise to amend our form of bill to conform to the State law and permit them to build these bridges. This matter was settled in conference in a manner that was satisfactory to the authors of the bill and to the committees of the House and the Senate.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It is a unanimous report?

Mr. DENISON. It is a unanimous report of the conferees, and I ask unanimous consent that the statements may be considered as having been read and the conference reports agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the reading of the reports or the statements in lieu thereof be dispensed with and that the conference reports be agreed to. The Clerk will report the bills by title.

The Clerk read the titles of the bills.

CONFERENCE REPORT—LEBANON BRIDGE ROAD

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9137) granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River on the Lebanon-Hartsville road in Wilson and Trousdale Counties, Tenn., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2 and agree to the following amendment in lieu thereof: Page 2, line 9, strike out the last two words, "sufficient to", and strike out all of line 10 and line 11 down to and including the word "cost" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "which, together with the sinking fund created from the tolls from other bridges authorized by the law of the State of Tennessee which provides for the construction of the bridge to be built under this act, shall be sufficient to amortize the bonds issued under such act"; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

E. E. DENISON,
TILMAN PARKS,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. L. JONES,
PORTER H. DALE,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9137) granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River on the Lebanon-Hartsville road in Wilson and Trousdale Counties, Tenn., submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and embodied in the accompanying conference report as to said amendment, namely:

As the bill passed the House it was in the usual form for granting authority to States to construct a bridge and authorized the State of Tennessee to collect tolls and apply the proceeds of the tolls to the maintenance, operation, and repair of the bridge and to create a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge, and that thereafter the bridge should be made free.

The Senate amended the bill so as to make the toll provisions conform to an act of the Tennessee Legislature which authorized the State highway commission to construct the bridge. The act of the Tennessee Legislature authorizing the construction of the bridge in question grouped certain bridges and authorized the State highway commission to issue bonds and construct two or more bridges and collect tolls thereon until all of the bonds issued for the construction of all the bridges were paid for and thereafter make them free. This provision was not in harmony with the policy heretofore followed by the House and the Senate in granting franchises for the construction of toll bridges. It has been the policy of Congress heretofore to provide that when sufficient tolls have been collected from a bridge to pay for its cost of construction it should thereafter be made free. The act of the Tennessee Legislature provides that tolls may be collected on each of the bridges until all of them are paid for.

The managers on the part of the House agreed to recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment. The amendment agreed upon by the managers on the part of the House and the Senate provides that the State of Tennessee may charge tolls for the use of the bridges authorized by the acts of the Tennessee State Legislature and that the tolls may be applied to the payment of the cost of maintaining, operating, and repairing the bridges, and create a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the bonds issued for the construction of all the bridges, and they shall thereafter be made free. The effect of the amendment agreed to is that these bridges may be constructed and amortized in accordance with the acts of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee which provide for their construction. While this is a departure from the policy heretofore followed by Congress in granting franchises for the construction of such bridges, it was thought advisable to consent to this departure in these cases in order not to prevent the construction of the bridges. The agreement was reached, however, upon the understanding that the action in these cases is not to be taken as a precedent and that similar action will not be agreed to in other cases.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9147) "An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Tennessee River, on the Jasper-Chattanooga road in Marion County, Tenn.," submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and embodied in the accompanying conference report as to said amendment, namely:

As the bill passed the House it was in the usual form for granting authority to States to construct a bridge, and authorized the State of Tennessee to collect tolls and apply the proceeds of the tolls to the maintenance, operation, and repair of the bridge, and to create a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge, and that thereafter the bridge should be made free.

The Senate amended the bill so as to make the toll provisions conform to an act of the Tennessee Legislature which authorized the State highway commission to construct the bridge. The act of the Tennessee Legislature authorizing the construction of the bridge in question grouped certain bridges and authorized the State highway commission to issue bonds and construct two or more bridges and collect tolls thereon until all of the bonds issued for the construction of all the bridges were paid for and thereafter make them free. This provision was not in harmony with the policy heretofore followed by the House and the Senate in granting franchises for the construction of toll bridges. It has been the policy of Congress heretofore to provide that when sufficient tolls have been collected from a bridge to pay for its cost of construction it should thereafter be made free. The act of the Tennessee Legislature provides that tolls may be collected on each of the bridges until all of them are paid for.

The managers on the part of the House agreed to recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment. The amendment agreed upon by the managers on the part of the House and the Senate provides that the State of Tennessee may charge tolls for the use of the bridges authorized by the acts of the Tennessee State Legislature and that the tolls may be applied to the payment of the cost of maintaining, operating, and repairing the bridges, and create a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the bonds issued for the construction of all the bridges, and they shall thereafter be made free. The effect of the amendment agreed to is that these bridges may be constructed and amortized in accordance with the acts of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee which provide for their construction. While this is a departure from the policy heretofore followed by Congress in granting franchises for the construction of such bridges, it was thought advisable to consent to this departure in these cases in order not to prevent the construction of the bridges. The agreement was reached, however, upon the understanding that the action in these cases is not to be taken as a precedent and that similar action will not be agreed to in other cases.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND THE FUNERAL OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JAMES A. GALLIVAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Chair will designate the Members of the House to attend the funeral of the late JAMES A. GALLIVAN.

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following committee: Mr. TREADWAY, Mr. TINKHAM, Mr. DALLINGER, Mr. LUCE, Mr. ANDREW, Mr. FROTHINGHAM, Mr. GIFFORD, Mr. UNDERHILL, Mr. BOWLES, Mr. FOSS, Mr. MARTIN, Mrs. ROGERS, Mr. STOBBS, Mr. CONNERY, Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts, Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. WASON, Mr. BYRNS, Mr. CARSS, Mr. EDWARDS, Mr. BOYLAN, and Mr. REED of Arkansas.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committe on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am wondering how we are to know just what committee is on call. The Committees on Rivers and Harbors, the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and Agriculture precede the Committee on Foreign Affairs. By unanimous consent last week the Foreign Affairs Committee was given a day. Was consent given that they should have two days?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was the understanding that the Foreign Affairs Committee would simply be moved forward to go ahead of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The other committees were not disturbed at all by the agreement.

Mr. CRAMTON. So that after to-day when the Committee on Foreign Affairs has occupied the day, the call will then revert back to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and then proceed in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct and that was the order made by unanimous consent some days ago.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to make a suggestion now, if I may, Mr. Speaker. I believe the Members of the House are entitled to know when these committees are going to be reached. I was unfortunately affected a week ago when I was absent on official business and a bill was called up by this committee to which I was known to be opposed. The committe was taken up out of order. I believe hereafter I shall object to any transfer of position on this calendar. If committees have not any business when they are called, let them be passed over and give other committees an opportunity.

PAYMENT TO THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2549) providing for payment to the German Government of $461.59 in behalf of the heirs or representatives of German nationals, John Adolf, Hermann Pegel, Franz Lipfert, Albert Wittenburg, Karl Behr, and Hans Dechantsreiter, and I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that this bill S. 2549 may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The House automatically resolves into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2549) providing for payment to the German Government of $461.59 in behalf of the heirs or representatives of the German nationals, John Adolf, Hermann Pegel, Franz Lipfert, Albert Wittenburg, Karl Behr, and Hans Dechantsreiter, with Mr. CRAMTON in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be paid to the German Government, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $461.59 for the heirs or representatives of the German nationals, John Adolf, Hermann Pegel, Franz Lipfert, Albert Wittenburg, Karl Behr, and Hans Dechantsreiter, who lost their lives while in the status of seamen in the American merchant marine; the above sum of $461.59 having been covered into the general fund of the Treasury Department as required by the statutes relating to the disposition of effects and unpaid wages of deceased seamen on the American vessels.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, this bill authorizes the payment of $461.59 to the personal representatives of citizens of Germany. These men were in our service prior to the war as seamen on American ships. The sum of $461.59 represents their wages which were due them at the time of death. The money has been passed into the United States Treasury and this bill authorizes the payment of it to their respective heirs.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I presume the real opposition to the bill will not be apparent under the present organization of the committee. Does the gentleman know of any opposition to the bill?

Mr. PORTER. I do not. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise is not in order. If general debate has been concluded the Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill for amendment.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. TILSON having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRAMTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2549 and had directed him to report the same back with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion by Mr. PORTER to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report concerning the claims against the United States presented by the German Government on behalf of the heirs or representatives of the German nationals, John Adolf, Hermann Pegel, Franz Lipfert, Albert Wittenburg, Karl Behr, and Hans Dechantsreiter, for various amounts aggregating $461.59, which have been covered into the general fund of the Treasury Department as required by the statutes relating to the disposition of effects and unpaid wages of deceased seamen on American vessels, it appearing that each of the German nationals referred to lost his life while in the status of seaman in the American merchant marine. The report requests that the Congress be asked to authorize the appropriation of the sum necessary to pay these claims.

I recommend that, in order to effect a settlement of these claims in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State, the Congress authorize an appropriation of the sum of $461.59.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 9, 1926.

The PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to submit, with a view to its transmission to the Congress, the following report and recommendation respecting the claims presented by the German Government on behalf of the heirs or representatives of the German nationals hereinafter named for the various amounts, aggregating $461.59, which have been covered into the general fund of the Treasury Department as required by the statutes relating to the disposition of effects and unpaid wages of deceased seamen on American vessels.

The essential facts concerning these claims are substantially as follows:

During the years from 1914 to 1917 the German nationals referred to died intestate within the jurisdiction of the United States, leaving their estates to German nationals abroad. The following is a list of such estates which were claimed by the heirs after the reestablishment of peace between the United States and Germany:

"1. John Adolf, a seaman on the American ship Henry Wilson, was drowned on July 3, 1914, in the Kirchak River, Alaska, leaving an estate in the amount of $218.22. This sum was turned over to the Treasury Department of the United States by the United States district court in San Francisco on February 6, 1922.

"2. Harmann Pegel, a ship's steward, died in the Ancon Hospital, Ancon, Canal Zone, on December 25, 1915, leaving an estate in the amount of $68.36.

"3. Franz Lipfert, a seaman, died on the Amercian steamer Northern Pacific on June 30, 1916, leaving an estate in the amount of $25.94.

"4. Albert Wittenburg, a sailor, died at Naknek, Alaska, on June 26, 1916, leaving an estate in the amount of $106.82.

"The sums referred to under Nos. 2, 3, and 4, were likewise turned over to the United States Treasury Department on March 13, 1922.

"5. Karl Behr, a seaman on the schooner Hugh de Payens, was drowned in San Juan Harbor in February, 1917, leaving an estate in the amount of $25.75, which was turned over to the United States Treasury Department by the United States district court in San Juan.

"6. Hans Dechantsreiter, a sailor on the steamship Illinois, was killed by an accident on board that boat, May 29, 1916, leaving a net estate in the amount of $16.50, which was turned over to the United States Treasury Department by the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York."

The essential requirements of the statutes with respect to the disposition of the effects and unpaid wages of a deceased seaman on an American vessel are that they be delivered by the master or owner of the vessel to a United States shipping commissioner to be turned over to the United States court for the judicial district in which the home port or terminal port of the vessel is located and that the court shall hold such funds for a period of six years, subject to legal claims that may be presented and established against the same, and that the balance of such funds not required to pay claims substantiated before the court shall be deposited by the court and covered into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States. (Secs. 4538, 4539, 4541, 4542, 4543, 4544, and 4545, Revised Statutes, the act of Mar. 3, 1897, 29 Stat. 689, and secs. 289 to 291 of the Judicial Code, 36 Stat. 1167. Also 1 Comp. Gen. 557.)

The authorized procedure appears to have been followed with respect to the wages and proceeds of effects of the seaman above named and the claims under consideration were not presented to the court within the period of six years after the moneys had been received by the said court. Accordingly, the said moneys became Government moneys and were deposited and covered into the general fund as above stated as miscellaneous receipts and can be withdrawn therefrom only in consequence of an appropriation made by the Congress.

As a summary of the essential facts regarding these claims is embodied in this communication, it is deemed unnecessary to accompany it with copies of the correspondence in the case. All or any part of the correspondence will, of course, be furnished should the Congress so desire.

In view of the difficulties of communicating with Germany prior to the entrance of the United States into the war and immediately after the cessation of hostilities, and in view of the intervening period of hostilities, it would appear equitable to allow the claimants in these cases to recover the funds turned over to the Treasury Department.

It will be noted from the inclosed copy of a communication from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to whom the matter was referred, that the proposed action is not inconsistent with the financial program of the Government.

I have the honor to recommend that the Congress be requested to authorize the appropriation of the sum of $461.59 in payment of these claims.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 8, 1926.

REGINALD ETHELBERT MYRIE

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9569) authorizing the payment of an indemnity to the British Government on account of the death of Reginald Ethelbert Myrie, alleged to have been killed in the Panama Canal Zone on February 5, 1921, by a United States Army motor truck. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the British Government, as an act of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, the sum of $1,000 as full indemnity for the death of Reginald Ethelbert Myrie, a British subject, alleged to have been killed in the Panama Canal Zone on February 5, 1921, by a United States Army truck driven by a private in the Motor Transport Corps, as set forth in the message of the President of January 4, 1928, printed as Senate Document No. 32, Seventieth Congress, first session; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion by Mr. PORTER to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State regarding the claim presented by the Government of Great Britain on behalf of Mr. David S. Myrie for compensation on account of the death of his son, Reginald Ethelbert Myrie, in the Panama Canal Zone on February 5, 1921. I recommend that the Congress as an act of grace, and without reference to the legal liability of the United States in the premises, authorize the appropriation of a sufficient amount to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1928.

The PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to submit, with a view to its transmission to the Congress, the following report and recommendation respecting the claim presented by the Government of Great Britain on behalf of Mr. David S. Myrie for compensation on account of the death of his son, Reginald Ethelbert Myrie, in the Panama Canal Zone.

The essential facts concerning this claim are admitted and are substantially as follows:

On February 5, 1921, at about 7.20 o'clock p. m., Simeon Bayliss and Reginald Ethelbert Myrie were riding in a coach on the Mount Hope Road, Panama Canal Zone. The coach was proceeding gradually on the right side of the road. Suddenly the occupants of the coach heard the sound of a horn which seemed to be at a distance from them of not more than 8 or 9 feet. Simeon Bayliss threw himself on the bank, which was to the right side of the road. Reginald Myrie, however, being on the left side of the coach, did not have an opportunity to leave it. Almost immediately the coach was struck by an automobile truck belonging to the United States Army. The truck was driven by Pvt. Roscoe Gower, motor transport company. Witnesses testified that the truck was driven at a high speed. As a result of the collision the coach was pushed along the road for a distance of approximately 75 feet and Mr. Myrie was thrown therefrom and under the truck, which severed his left leg and mashed other parts of his body. Mr. Myrie was assisted immediately by the people who gathered around the scene of the accident and as soon as possible he was taken to the Colon Hospital, where he received medical attention. Mr. Myrie died, however, at about 10 o'clock p. m. the same day as a result of the injuries received by him in the collision.

A board of officers appointed to determine the responsibility for the accident reached the following finding of facts and made the following recommendations:

"That the accident was avoidable; that the chauffer, Pvt. Roscoe Gower, motor transport company, was under the influence of liquor; that the careless driving and intoxicated condition of Private Gower were entirely responsible for the accident.

"In connection with claim for compensation for the death of Reginald Ethelbert Myrie this board is not empowered either under the one hundred and fifth article of war or General Orders, No. 37, War Department, 1920, to recommend any compensation for death of personal injuries. The board, however, finds that the death of Reginald Ethelbert Myrie was caused directly by the careless driving of Pvt. Roscoe Gower, Quartermaster Corps. It is believed the only redress is a civil suit against Private Gower, who is now serving a sentence of 18 months in the Gamboa Penitentiary for the killing of Reginald Ethelbert Myrie. At the present time Private Gower has no accrued pay due him.

"It is believed if any compensation were to be granted for the death of Reginald Ethelbert Myrie, that $1,000 United States currency would be just and sufficient amount.

"At the time of the accident Private Gower was an agent of the United States Government, as the truck he drove was owned by the United States Government and operated for the military service of the United States."

By a note dated November 2, 1921, the ambassador of Great Britain at this Capital brought the claim to the attention of the Department of State. The ambassador stated that the claim was referred by the minister of Great Britain at Panama to the Governor of the Canal Zone and that in due course it was referred to the War Department, which replied that they had no appropriation from which the claim could be paid and that the only procedure to obtain payment therefor would be through a special act of Congress. The matter has since been the subject of several exchanges of communications between this department, the War Department, and the British Embassy, as a result of which the following conclusions have been reached:

(1) That the death of Mr. Reginald Ethelbert Myrie was caused by the careless driving and intoxicated condition of Private Gower, operating the truck for the military service of the United States.

(2) That under the circumstances which have been related, it would be proper, as an act of grace and without reference to the question of the legal liability of the United States, to pay to the father of the deceased an indemnity in the sum of $1,000. It appears from evidence furnished by the British Embassy that the deceased, who was unmarried, had been contributing to his father's support for a number of years at the rate of approximately $10 per month.

Accordingly, I have the honor to recommend, with the concurrence of the Secretary of War, that the Congress be requested to authorize the necessary appropriation.

As a summary of the essential facts regarding the accident and claim is embodied in this communication, it is deemed unnecessary to accompany it with copies of the correspondence in the case. All or any part of the correspondence will, of course, be furnished should the Congress so desire.

This claim was submitted to the Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, in your message dated April 5, 1926. A copy of Senate Document No. 91, containing this message, is inclosed.

It will be noted from the inclosed copy of a communication from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to whom the matter was referred, that the proposed action is not inconsistent with the financial program of the President.

Respectfully submitted.

REIMBURSEMENT TO GREAT BRITAIN FOR CERTAIN SUMS EXPENDED BY THE REV. F. NORTH

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12179) to provide for the reimbursement of the Government of Great Britain on account of certain sums expended by the British chaplain in Moscow, the Rev. F. North, for the relief of American nationals in Russia in 1920, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether or not any of the bills he has here to reimburse citizens of other countries have to do with the citizens of the Republic of China?

Mr. PORTER. There are two or three bills of that character. I may say in reply that all of these claim bills approve the settlements which the proper officers of the Government have made with the citizens of foreign countries.

Mr. O'CONNELL. And it has the approval of the Budget?

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the Government of Great Britain, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of legal liability therefor, the sum of $19,407.60, being the equivalent of the sum of £3,988, at par exchange, as reimbursement on account of certain sums expended by the British chaplain in Moscow, the Rev. F. North, for the relief of American nationals in Russia in 1920, as set forth in the message of the President of February 27, 1928, printed as Senate Document No. 66, Seventieth Congress, first session; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to carry out the purpose of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion by Mr. PORTER to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to a claim presented by His Britannic Majesty's Government for the payment of a sum of money turned over to American citizens in Russia by the British subject, the Rev. Mr. North, upon his departure from Moscow, and I recommend that an appropriation be authorized to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE.

FEBRUARY 25, 1928.

The PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to bring to your attention the request made by His Britannic Majesty's Government for reimbursement on account of certain sums expended by the British chaplain in Moscow, the Rev. F. North, for the relief of American nationals in Russia in 1920.

The facts of the case may be briefly stated as follows: In March or April, 1920, the Rev. F. North borrowed from such sources as he found it possible to obtain them sums of money for the purpose of providing relief to destitute members of the British colony in Moscow. It is stated by the British foreign office that the receipts given by the Rev. F. North stipulated that the sums were to be repaid in pounds sterling at the British foreign office, London, "at the best possible rate of exchange to guarantee them against loss." It further appears that the Rev. F. North assisted not only British nationals, but also French, Swedish, Dutch, and Danish nationals, as well as expending about a million rubles for the relief of Americans in Russia. After having expended these rubles for American relief, and at the time of his departure from Russia, he turned over a sum of 5,000,000 rubles to the American association in Moscow for the use of Americans then in Russia.

It appears that the money furnished to destitute British subjects in Russia, as well as the sums expended for French, Swedish, Dutch, and Danish nationals, and the sums used for the relief of Americans, have been repaid by His Britannic Majesty's Government and that the French, Swedish, Dutch, and Danish Governments have repaid their proportionate share to His Britannic Majesty's Government. The sum expended for the relief of American nationals has not as yet been paid, and therefore His Britannic Majesty's Government is requesting this Government to pay to it the proportionate share of money which was used for the benefit of Americans in Russia.

It has been impossible to ascertain the exact exchange value of the rubles expended or turned over to Americans by Mr. North for American relief in Russia. The estimates of the exchange value have varied within a very extensive margin. In repaying these funds His Britannic Majesty's Government found themselves confronted with the same difficulty and had to fix upon an arbitrary rate of exchange which in their opinion was equitable and just.

His Britannic Majesty's Government has recently suggested to this Government that an equitable and just value of the sum expended for the relief of American nationals would be £3,988. This amount is obtained by applying the average rate of exchange from May, 1919, to May, 1920, for the first million rubles expended by the Reverend North himself; that is, at the rate of 760 rubles to the pound sterling and for the 5,000,000 rubles turned over by Reverend North upon his departure from Russia, at the rate of exchange for rubles in March, 1920; that is, 1,870 rubles to the pound sterling, giving a total value of £3,988. It is the view of this department that the Government, recognizing the assistance rendered by the subject of a friendly foreign government in a time of emergency, should promptly pay the amount requested, and I have the honor to recommend that the Congress be requested to authorize the appropriation of $19,407.60, being the equivalent of the sum £3,988, at par of exchange, in payment of the claim of His Britannic Majesty's Government as an act of grace and without reference to the question of the legal liability of the United States.

The summary of the essential facts in the case being embodied in this communication, it is deemed unnecessary to accompany it with copies of the correspondence in the case. All or any part of that correspondence will be furnished should you or the Congress so desire.

It will be observed from the inclosed communication from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to whom the matter was referred, that the proposed action is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Respecfully submitted.

EDWIN TUCKER

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 148, to provide for the payment of an indemnity to the British Government to compensate the dependents of Edwin Tucker, a British subject, alleged to have been killed by a United States Army ambulance in Colon, Panama, and ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up House Joint Resolution 148, which is on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the British Government, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, the sum of $2,500 as full indemnity for the death of Edwin Tucker, a British subject alleged to have been killed by a United States Army ambulance in Colon, Panama, on or about December 6, 1924, as set forth in the message of the President of December 17, 1927, and printed as Senate Document No. 20, Seventieth Congress, first session; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, concerning a claim against the United States, presented by the Government of Great Britain for compensation to the relatives of Edwin Tucker, a British subject who was killed by a United States Army ambulance in Colon, Panama, on or about December 6, 1924. The report requests that the recommendation as indicated therein be adopted and that the Congress authorize the appropriation of the sum necessary to compensate the claimants in this case.

I recommend that in order to effect a settlement of the claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State, the Congress, as an act of grace and without reference to the legal liability of the United States in the premises, authorize an appropriation of $2,500.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 17, 1927.

The PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to submit, with a view to its transmission to the Congress, the following report and recommendation respecting the claim presented by the Government of Great Britain for compensation to the relatives of Edwin Tucker, a British subject who was killed by a United States Army ambulance in Colon, Panama, on or about December 6, 1924.

The essential facts concerning the death of Edwin Tucker are admitted and are substantially as follows:

The chargé d'affaires ad interim of Great Britain at this capital, in a note No. 1108, dated December 31, 1925, informed this department that on December 6, 1924, an Army ambulance from France Field, Canal Zone, operated by Pvt. Wilbert L. Schwartzfiger, was engaged in conveying an injured man from the military barracks at France Field to the Canal Zone Hospital in Colon city, ran into the Lee Chong Building at Bolivar and Ninth Streets, Colon, striking and killing Edwin Tucker, who, at the time the accident occurred, was standing outside the drug store which is in that building. A copy of a medical certificate issued by the physicians of Colon Hospital testifying to the cause of Edwin Tucker's death was inclosed. This report indicates that the death resulted from the injury received when Mr. Tucker was struck by the ambulance.

It was added that at the time of his death Edwin Tucker assisted in maintaining and supporting his mother, Mrs. Eliza Tucker, and his son, George Tucker, 11 years old, both of whom resided in St. James Parish, in the island of Jamaica. A brother of the deceased, acting on behalf of himself and the dependent relatives above mentioned, endeavored without success to obtain compensation from the military authorities of the Canal Zone. Accordingly the chargé d'affaires expressed the hope that the competent authorities of this Government would see their way in the interests of justice to accord suitable compensation to the mother and son of the deceased, who have been deprived, through no fault of their own, of their principal means of support.

The matter was brought to the attention of the Secretary of War, and after some correspondence the Acting Secretary of War informed me on July 17, 1926, that the facts in the case as set forth in the note dated December 31, 1925, from the chargé d'affaires ad interim of Great Britain, were substantially correct. He added, however, that G. C. M. ambulance No. 73192, which was property of the United States, was carrying an emergency patient injured at France Field, Canal Zone, from the post hospital at that station to the hospital at Colon. The ambulance was proceeding along Bolivar Street at a speed of about 25 miles an hour; it was on the left side of the street, and that when at a point near Ninth Street, in maneuvering to avoid a collision, it skidded to the curb on the right side of the street, overturned and killed Edwin Tucker, a colored civilian, who was at that time on the sidewalk.

A board of officers, convened at France Field for the purpose of investigating the accident, reported in part as follows:

"That Edwin Tucker (colored), a resident of Colon, Republic of Panama, was accidentally killed by United States ambulance No. 73192.

"That the death of Mr. Edwin Tucker was due to no fault or negligence of his own.

"That the driver of the United States ambulance No. 73192 (Private Schwartzfiger) was exceeding the speed limit when this accident occurred.

"That an extenuating circumstance did exist when Private Schwartzfiger was speeding, namely, he was carrying a seriously injured patient to the Colon Hospital. That this accident was due to a vehicle turning in front of the ambulance without warning being given.

"That United States ambulance was damaged to the extent of approximately $600."

The Acting Secretary of War further stated that it is a well-established principle that the Government can not be held liable for its agents' torts, and that any compensation to persons for injury, except in Air Service accidents, must be provided for by a special act of the Congress. He added that the War Department had heretofore refrained from expressing an opinion as to the merits of proposed legislation in similar cases, and in keeping with that policy withheld a recommendation for or against this claim.

The matter was given further consideration by this department, and on August 25, 1926, I informed the Secretary of War that, while this department is aware that the Government of the United States can not be sued on account of death resulting from the wrongful acts of its agents, it believes that the Government is morally liable in such cases, and that an effort should be made to provide suitable relief therein. I further stated that I was considering recommending that the sum of $2,500 be appropriated as an act of grace and without reference to the legal liability of this Government to compensate the dependents of Mr. Tucker on account of his death, and requested to be informed whether the Secretary of War considered this amount to be a reasonable award, and also whether he would interpose an objection to the passage of legislation providing for compensation in this case.

The Secretary of War replied on October 1, 1926, and stated that this sum is considered a reasonable award, and that his department would interpose no objection to the passage of legislation providing for such compensation.

As the report which was made by the board of officers convened at France Field for the purpose of investigating the accident indicates that the death of Edwin Tucker resulted from no fault or negligence of his own, I have the honor to recommend that the Congress be requested to appropriate, as an act of grace and without reference to the legal liability of the United States, the sum $2,500 to compensate the dependent relatives of Edwin Tucker.

As a summary of the essential facts regarding the accident and the claim is embodied in this communication, it is deemed unnecessary to accompany it with copies of the correspondence in this case. All or any part of the correspondence will of course be furnished should the Congress so desire.

It will be noted from the inclosed copy of a communication from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to whom the matter was referred, that the proposed action is not inconsistent with the financial program of the Government.

House Joint Resolution No. 355, Sixty-ninth Congress, authorizing an appropriation of $2,500 in payment of this claim, was passed by the House of Representatives on February 28, 1927, and was pending in the Senate when it adjourned on March 4, 1927.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM WISEMAN

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 149, to authorize an appropriation for the compensation of William Wiseman, and I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up House Joint Resolution 149, which is on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems that it is quite easy for foreigners or their estates to be paid compensation for injuries done them by the United States Government, but when it comes to our own citizens, who are killed by airplanes and other things, it is practically impossible to secure any compensation for them or their dependents. While this is not a matter upon which I would want to base an objection to bills that are called up in this way, I take this opportunity of calling the attention of the House and the Congress to the injustice done to our own citizens in giving preference to nationals of other countries in claims of this nature.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. A Member of the House a few weeks ago had passed what was called the Underhill bill, in order to facilitate the payment of claims of our own citizens against the Government. Has the gentleman any information as to what prospect there is of the passage of that bill in the other body?

Mr. DYER. I am sure that the gentleman knows that I have no knowledge, and I do not think anyone here has any knowledge in respect to that. It is legislation, certainly, that ought to be enacted into law, in order to give to our own citizens an opportunity to recover or for their estates to recover because of injuries done by Government agencies. At the present time there is practically no way of obtaining compensation, although we are continually paying foreigners similar claims.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Some of these are of long standing, and they are all being paid upon the advice of the Secretary of State and the Director of the Budget. Does the gentleman not think that we ought to pay them and get rid of them?

Mr. DYER. I am not objecting to them, but I am making this statement merely for the purpose of calling attention to conditions that exist in respect to our own citizens. I know of a case of a boy in my own State who was killed by an airplane more than 10 years ago. The widowed mother of this boy has never been able to recover one penny.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Why not?

Mr. KING. What is the reason for that?

Mr. DYER. There is no law authorizing the Government to pay, and the State Department, of course, does not take cognizance of it. The only way that we can get it through is by a claim through the Committee on Claims of the House, and that committee has thousands of claims and it is very difficult to get consideration. Then, again, it is almost impossible to get a favorable report in such a case from the War Department or from whatever department the agency doing the damage was connected with. They are slow, and they practically refuse to admit liability in any of those cases. When it comes to foreigners, especially if they are the nationals of some great foreign power, the State Department, quickly and without making, in my opinion, any very careful investigation, reports the cases to the House for the purpose of getting them through, in order that we may continue to have amicable relations and no trouble with these countries over such matters.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the Committee on Foreign Affairs thoroughly investigates these claims, and they are not recommended for payment until that committee passes on them.

Mr. DYER. I am very glad to know that, and I have very great confidence in the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. KING. How would it be to change these things around and let the Foreign Affairs Committee consider some of these other claims now before the Committee on Claims?

Mr. DYER. I have no criticism to make of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KING. They have not functioned for a couple of years.

Mr. DYER. They are endeavoring to function through the legislation that was referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. EATON. Is the gentleman not familiar with the fact that American citizens are always wrong in the Washington point of view?

Mr. DYER. I do not want to say that. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Great Britain, as an act of grace and without reference to the question of legal liability, the sum of $9,200 in recognition of the services of William Wiseman as British vice consul at Salina Cruz, Mexico, in behalf of American interests from April 12, 1914, to December 13, 1917, as set forth in the message of the President of December 17, 1927, printed as Senate Document No. 22, Seventieth Congress, first session; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in regard to the services in behalf of the United States of William Wiseman, British vice consul at Salina Cruz, Mexico, during the period from April 12, 1914, to December 13, 1917, when, with the permission of the British Government and at the request of this Government, he had charge of the American consulate at Salina Cruz and of American interests in the district surrounding that place. The conclusion reached by the Secretary of State has my approval, and I recommend that the Congress authorize an appropriation of $9,200 to be paid to Mr. Wiseman in recognition of the services which he so generously rendered.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 17, 1927.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 16, 1927.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House:

On April 12, 1914, the American vice consul at Salina Cruz left his post on leave of absence for a visit to the United States, leaving the consulate and American interests in that district in charge of William Wiseman, British vice consul. A few days after the vice consul's departure political relations between the United States and Mexico and conditions in Mexico became so acute that he did not return, and an American consular officer was not sent to Salina Cruz until December 13, 1917. From April 12, 1914, to December 13, 1917, Mr. Wiseman, with the permission of the British Government, continued in charge of American interests for the district surrounding Salina Cruz. The disturbed political condition of Mexico made the care of American interests an exceedingly delicate and exacting task. In a report of the work done by Mr. Wiseman an American consul, who was assigned to Salina Cruz subsequent to the relinquishment of the care of American interests by Mr. Wiseman, said of him:

"During a considerable portion of this period the work was undoubtedly very heavy and exacting, requiring his entire time and energy for perhaps 18 hours a day for weeks at a time. There were many American refugees to be cared for and gotten out of the country and afforded suitable protection. * * * Many American vessels called at this port, either in distress or in ignorance of the acute political conditions, and it was Mr. Wiseman's duty, which he accomplished very successfully, to get them out of port again. * * * I have often heard the officers of American merchant vessels and other American citizens speak very highly of the manner in which Mr. Wiseman cared for American interests, and I have never heard any adverse criticism."

The only allowance which this Government made to Mr. Wiseman appears to have been for the expenses incurred by him in connection with his care of American interests. The fees collected by him for consular services on behalf of the United States were transmitted to this Government and duly deposited in the Treasury of the United States. It appears that he was informed that the question of compensation of his services would be reserved for future consideration.

It has been customary for the Government of the United States, upon the request of a friendly Government to authorize its diplomatic and consular officers to take charge temporarily of the interests of that Government, and in such cases to decline to permit those officers to accept remuneration for their services. Foreign governments frequently lend the aid of their diplomatic and consular officers to the United States under like conditions. The case of Mr. Wiseman, however, appears to be exceptional. He was British vice consul at Salina Cruz, but the department is informed that he received no salary from the British Government. He was in business and was local manager for the Central & South American Telegraph Co., an American company, and his principal income was derived from his salary as manager. It is understood that the care of American interests over a period of some 44 months interfered materially with his private affairs, and doubtless resulted in personal loss. The circumstances appear to be so unusual and the period of his service for the United States so extended that it would seem that this Government could not properly do less in recognition of the value of his services than to present him, as an act of grace, with an amount which would appropriately compensate him. It is understood that the British Government would not object to this course.

Assuming, as I feel safe in doing, that the Congress will view with favor a proposal appropriately to compensate Mr. Wiseman, the amount which, in all probability, would have been paid to an American consul at Salina Cruz during the period herein mentioned would appear to be a fair measure of the pecuniary recognition of the services of Mr. Wiseman. The American consul who relieved Mr. Wiseman received $2,500 a year, and at that rate the total amount which should be paid to Mr. Wiseman in recognition of his services for the entire 44 months would be approximately $9,200.

It is the view of this department that in matters of this kind this Government should pursue a generous course in recognizing the assistance rendered it in the interest of this country by representatives of other governments, and I therefore recommend that Congress be asked to appropriate for payment to Mr. William Wiseman, formerly British vice consul at Salina Cruz, the sum of $9,200 in recognition of his services in behalf of American interests in that place.

It will be noted from the inclosed communication from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to whom the matter was referred, that the proposed action is not in conflict with your financial program.

A report on this subject was transmitted to Congress by you on April 23, 1926. A copy of this report is inclosed.

Respectfully submitted.

AREND KAMP AND FRANCIS GORT

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 150, to provide for the payment of an indemnity to the Government of the Netherlands for compensation for personal injuries sustained by two Netherlands subjects, Arend Kamp and Francis Gort, while the U. S. S. Canibas was loading on May 1, 1919, at Rotterdam, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up House Joint Resolution 150, which is on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the Government of the Netherlands, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, the sum of $500 as full compensation for personal injuries sustained by Arend Kamp, a Netherlands subject, and the sum of $500 as full compensation for personal injuries sustained by Francis Gort, a Netherlands subject, while the U. S. S. Canibas was loading on May 1, 1919, at Rotterdam, as set forth in the message of the President of December 19, 1927, printed as Senate Document No. 30, Seventieth Congress, first session; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and the letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report regarding two claims presented by the Government of the Netherlands against the Government of the United States for compensation for personal injuries sustained by two Netherlands subjects, Arend Kamp and Francis Gort, while the U. S. S. Canibas was loading on May 1, 1919, at Rotterdam.

I recommend that, in order to effect a settlement of these claims in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State, the Congress, as an act of grace and without reference to the question of the legal liability of the United States in the premises, authorize an appropriation in the sum of $1,000, $500 of which is to be paid to Mr. Arend Kamp and $500 to be paid to Mr. Francis Gort.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 19, 1927.

DECEMBER 17, 1927.

The PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to submit, with a view to its transmission to Congress, the following report and recommendation regarding two claims presented by the Government of the Netherlands against the Government of the United States for compensation for personal injuries sustained by two Netherlands subjects, Arend Kamp and Francis Gort, while the U. S. S. Canibas was loading on May 1, 1919, at Rotterdam.

The U. S. S. Canibas on May 1, 1919, was owned by the Government of the United States, controlled by the United States Shipping Board, manned by a Navy crew, and prior to the accident in question was operated for the account of the War Department. At the time of the accident, however, naval stores were being transferred to the U. S. S. Canibas by means of a cargo net from the barge Johanna, which was a Dutch vessel chartered by the United States Naval Port Office at Rotterdam. As one of the loads was being hoisted out of the hold of the Johanna by a windlass on the Canibas, the Netherlands subjects, Kamp and Gort, who were on board the Johanna, endeavored to prevent the load from interfering with a stovepipe on the Johanna. The load was cleared from the stovepipe, when the rope parted and the load fell on the two men, injuring both severely.

The board of naval officers which convened on May 1, 1919, for the purpose of investigating the accident, rendered the following findings:

"(1) Accident due to fall of loaded cargo net on Arend Kamp and Francis Gort through parting of fall.

"(2) Parting of fall due to weakness in the fall, which might have been inherent or could have developed during morning's operation.

"(3) Responsibility can not be placed on any particular person, inasmuch as the fall was apparently in good condition, from outside inspection, before this work started."

Under date of May 6, 1920, the Solicitor of the Navy Department, in a communication to the Secretary of the Navy, made the following statement:

"While it is doubtful that either of the two men have a legal claim against the United States, nevertheless it is believed that the doubts should be resolved in favor of the claimants, and it is recommended that the record be referred to the War Department with the request that the claimants each be paid the sum of $500 in full of all claims on account of the injuries sustained, including hospital charges and medical attendance, under the provisions of an act to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad (Public, No. 133), approved April 18, 1918."

In a letter dated May 21, 1920, addressed to Mr. Kamp, by the United States naval staff representatives' office at London, Mr. Kamp was informed that advice had been received from the Navy Department at Washington that he would be paid the sum of $500 on account of the injuries sustained by him on May 1, 1919, which sum was to include hospital expenses and medical attention.

Pursuant to the recommendation of the Solicitor for the Navy Department, the Acting Secretary of the Navy addressed a memorandum to the Secretary of War requesting that Kamp and Gort each be paid the sum of $500 in full of all claims arising out of their injuries under the provisions of the act approved April 18, 1918.

However, the War Department, following a ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury Department, rendered December 14, 1920, declined to pay the claims in question on the grounds that the injuries suffered by the claimants were the consequence of their own negligence and were not caused by the negligence of persons composing the military and naval forces of the United States, and that the injuries could not, therefore, be deemed to give rise to "damages caused by the American military forces" within any possible meaning of section 1 of the act approved April 18, 1918.

The Netherlands Government brought the claims to the attention of the department in a note dated May 27, 1920, and has persistently pressed the matter since that date. The department referred the matter to both the War and Navy Departments and inquired whether those departments were still of the opinion that without reference to the question of legal liability a compassionate allowance should be made to the injured persons and whether they would be willing to support any recommendation which might be made by this department to Congress regarding the matter.

The War Department replied in a letter dated July 30, 1923, with the suggestion that in the event the State Department desired that a recommendation be made to the Congress, the Navy Department take the action to support such recommendation, provided the Navy Department believes that a payment should be made in the case.

The Navy Department replied in a letter dated May 15, 1923, that should the Department of State recommend to the Congress that an appropriation be made to pay to each of the claimants the sum of $500 as a compassionate allowance and the bill should be referred to the Navy Department for a report, favorable action thereon would be recommended.

I have the honor to suggest, therefor, that you recommend to the Congress that as an act of grace and without reference to the question of the legal liability of the United States, an appropriation in the sum of $1,000 be authorized to effect a settlement of these claims, $500 of which is to be paid to Mr. Arend Kamp and $500 to be paid to Mr. Francis Gort.

It may be stated that the claim was brought to the attention of the Sixty-ninth Congress in a message from the President dated December 21, 1925, which is printed in Senate Document No. 26, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session.

It will be noted from the inclosed communication from the Director of the Budget, to whom the matter was referred, that the proposed action is not in conflict with the financial program of this Government.

Respectfully submitted.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

It appearing that final action was not taken on this recommendation by the Sixty-ninth Congress, I beg to suggest the submission of the matter anew to the consideration of the present Congress.

It will be observed from the inclosed communication from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to whom the matter was referred, that the proposed action is not inconsistent with the financial program of the Government.

Respectfully submitted.

INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR THE EXPLORATION OF THE ARCTIC REGIONS BY MEANS OF THE AIRSHIP

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 153, providing for the contribution of the United States to the plans for the organization of the International Society for the Exploration of the Arctic Regions by Means of the Airship. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Is this a unanimous report from the gentleman's committee?

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the joint resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That, in compliance with the recommendation of the President contained in his message of January 4, 1928, printed as House Document No. 133, Seventieth Congress, first session, an annual appropriation for five years of $300 is hereby authorized as the contribution of the United States in the plans of the organization of the International Society for the Exploration of the Arctic Regions by Means of the Airship for the establishment of geophysical observations in the inner Arctic regions.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State concerning the plans of the International Society for the Exploration of the Arctic Regions by Means of the Airship, for the establishment of geophysical observations of the inner Arctic regions, toward the accomplishment of which the 19 governments whose countries are represented in the society have been requested to make an annual contribution for five years, for required preparatory work, in accordance with a schedule furnished by the society and accompanying the report of the Secretary of State. The annual contribution requested of the United States is $300.

The attention of Congress is especially invited to the strong indorsements of this project given by the Secretary of the Navy, the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, the Acting Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, the National Research Council, and the Carnegie Institution of Washington, as recited in the report of the Secretary of State.

In view of these favorable comments, and in conformity with the recommendation of the Secretary of State, I lay the matter before Congress for its determination whether it will authorize an annual appropriation of $300 for five years, as the contribution of the United States, on the condition that the other governments approached will also contribute the quotas assigned to them.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1928.

The PRESIDENT:

In May last the Norwegian Legation at Washington, by order of the Norwegian Government, transmitted to the Department of State a letter addressed to the Government of the United States and dated April 21, 1927, of which a copy is herewith inclosed, from the International Society for the Exploration of the Arctic Regions by Means of the Airship, signed by its president, Mr. Fridtjof Nansen, concerning the plans of that organization for the establishment of geophysical observations in the inner Arctic regions, toward the accomplishment of which the 19 governments whose countries are represented in the society have been requested to make an annual contribution for five years for required preparatory work, in accordance with a schedule which the society furnishes, and a copy of which is also inclosed. It will be observed that the annual contribution requested of the United States is $300.

The Secretary of State, being of the opinion that this project deserves serious consideration as a scientific enterprise of great potential practical value in several important fields, communicated copies of Mr. Nansen's letter to the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Navy, the Smithsonian Institution, the National Research Council, and the Carnegie Institution, for an expression of their views. Favorable responses have been received from all.

The Acting Secretary of Agriculture has replied that—

"The securing of more or less permanent and continuous meteorological and other observations from stations in the inner Arctic regions is regarded by this department as very desirable."

The Secretary of the Navy has replied as follows:

"It appears that the object of the project is to bring about an improved knowledge of the natural processes of the earth as an aid to weather forecasting in the future and also in the world's commerce and traffic. This department is glad to express its approval of an undertaking which, at the comparatively small cost set forth in the letter from the president of the society, may lead to an improved knowledge of the natural processes of the earth."

The Acting Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution has replied as follows:

"The institution enthusiastically indorses the value of the proposition. Hardly any conceivable research seems likely to add more of value to the world's knowledge of the controlling elements of meteorology than this."

The National Research Council has replied as follows:

"The executive board of the National Research Council, at its meeting this morning, adopted a resolution recommending, in response to your inquiry, that the United States Government accede to the request of Doctor Nansen, president of the International Society for the Exploration of the Arctic Regions by Means of the Airship, entailing an annual contribution from this Government during five years to help meet the expense of the preparatory work for the establishment by Doctor Nansen's society of observatories in the inner Arctic regions. This action of the National Research Council is based upon the careful consideration and recommendation of the project by the American Geophysical Union, which is a technical committee of the council and is especially competent to express an opinion in the matter."

By way of reply the Carnegie Institution of Washington has furnished a report by the director of the institution's department of research in terrestrial magnetism, as follows:

"1. The proposed scientific exploration, according to modern requirements, of the Arctic regions is to be undertaken under the auspices of the International Society for the Exploration of the Arctic Regions by Means of the Airship and under the guidance of those competent to give the best advice in the various lines of investigation.

"2. Only by international cooperation and thorough preparation may the desired objects be attained effectively. The society is therefore soliciting aid from the countries which in any manner may be interested in the advancement and application of scientific knowledge to be gained from studies of conditions in the Arctic.

"3. The contribution which the United States Government has been asked to make, namely, $300 a year for five years, is intended to assist in defraying the expenses for the necessary preparatory studies as to methods and equipment and for publication of results before the actual project may be undertaken with reasonable promise of success.

"4. Even if future events should make impossible the realization of the society's own project, the funds now solicited, on an international basis, would assure the initiation of investigations of definite value to any other Arctic expedition. There would, therefore, seem sufficient warrant for making the desired small contribution."

In view of the foregoing strong indorsements of the project, the undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to recommend that the matter be submitted to Congress with a view to that body's determination whether it will authorize an annual appropriation for five years of $300 as the contribution of the United States, provided that the other Governments approached will also appropriate the quota assigned to each.

The undersigned is advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that this would not be in conflict with the President's financial program.

Respectfully submitted.

CLAIM OF THE NORWEGIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 154, authorizing payment of the claim of the Norwegian Government for interest upon money advanced by it in connection with the protection of American interests in Russia. I ask unanimous consent for consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that this resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the joint resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the Government of Norway, as an act of grace and without reference to the question of legal liability, an amount equal to 6 per cent interest upon the sum advanced by the Government of Norway in connection with the care by its representatives of American interests in Moscow, Russia, during the years 1918 and 1919, but not to exceed a total of $4,000, as set forth in the message of the President of January 5, 1928, printed as Senate Document No. 37, Seventieth Congress, first session; and the appropriation for relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe made by the act approved April 17, 1917, is hereby made available for the payment of the claim aforesaid.

With committee amendments as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "Norway," insert "together with 6 per cent interest on the unpaid interest to date of payment" and on page 2, line 2, strike out the sign and figures "$4,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$5,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to a claim presented by the Government of Norway for the payment of interest on certain sums advanced by it for this Government in connection with its representation of American interests in Moscow, and I recommend that an appropriation be authorized to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 5, 1928.

The PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to bring to your attention the request made by the Norwegian Government for the payment of interests on certain sums advanced by it for this Government in connection with its representation of American interests in Moscow.

The facts of the case may be briefly stated as follows:

In September, 1918, the Government of the United States requested the Norwegian Government to take charge of the protection of American interests in Moscow, stating that it would reimburse the Norwegian Government for the expenses incurred in carrying out this request.

The Norwegian Government accordingly authorized its vice consul at Moscow to assume protection of American interests at that place. Various expenses were incurred by the vice consul in connection with his protection of American interests, and the Norwegian Government, by December 8, 1920, had paid him the sum of Kr. 65,162.97, representing the amount of the expenses incurred by him with interest to the date of payment. The Norwegian Government thereupon requested reimbursement by this Government of the sum of Kr. 65,162.97 with interest to the date of such reimbursement.

Due, in part, to the difficulty experienced by this Government in obtaining proper documentary evidence of the expenditures incurred by the vice consul, reimbursement was not made until July 13, 1925, when the Comptroller General of the United States allowed the Norwegian Government the sum of Kr. 65,162.97, the amount paid by it to the vice consul, but disallowed the claim for interest.

The Norwegian Government, in acknowledging the receipt of the sum allowed by the Comptroller General, requested that interest also be paid.

Because of the fact that reimbursement was not made until nearly five years after the funds had been advanced by the Norwegian Government it is the view of this department that this Government should pursue a generous course in recognizing the assistance rendered it by a friendly foreign government in a time of emergency.

The interest claimed amounts to approximately $4,000, and I have the honor to recommend that the Congress be requested to authorize the appropriation of this sum in payment of the Norwegian Government's claim, as an act of grace, and without reference to the question of the legal liability of the United States.

A summary of the essential facts regarding the case being embodied in this communication it is deemed unnecessary to accompany it with copies of the correspondence in the case. All, or any part, of that correspondence will, of course, be furnished should you or the Congress so desire.

It should be added that this claim was brought to the attention of the Sixty-ninth Congress in a message from the President dated April 23, 1926, printed in House Document No. 343, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, and that House Joint Resolution No. 246, Sixty-ninth Congress, for the payment of this claim, was introduced on May 25, 1926, and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. No action was taken by the committee on this resolution.

It will be observed from the inclosed communication from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to whom the matter was referred, that the proposed action is not inconsistent with the financial program of this Government.

Respectfully submitted.

MINISTER RESIDENT AND CONSUL GENERAL TO LIBERIA

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 12173 to repeal Revised Statute 1683 and part of Title XXII, section 32, of the United States Code. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1683 of the Revised Statutes and such portion of title 22, section 32, of the United States Code as fixes the compensation of the minister resident and consul general to Liberia, are hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which reads as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State recommending legislation authorizing an increase in the salary of the minister resident and consul general to Liberia from $5,000 to $10,000 per annum.

I am in full accord with the reasons advanced by the Secretary of State why the increase should be allowed, and I strongly urge upon the Congress the enactment of legislation authorizing it.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 7, 1928.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 7, 1928.

The PRESIDENT: The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to bring to the President's attention the matter of the salary of the minister resident and consul general to Liberia and to recommend that Congress be requested to enact legislation which will authorize an increase thereof to $10,000 per annum. In support of this recommendation, the following facts are submitted:

The salary of $5,000 now appropriated for this office is inadequate and is disproportionate to the salaries paid to the classified Foreign Service officers of the United States. The incumbent of this office is required to perform both diplomatic and consular functions, and for this dual service he receives a salary of only $5,000 per annum, which is $5,000 less than is paid to any other minister of the United States, $4,000 less than is paid to Foreign Service officers of class 1, $3,000 less than is paid to Foreign Service officers of class 2, $2,000 less than is paid to Foreign Service officers of class 3, $1,000 less than is paid to Foreign Service officers of class 4, and is equal only to the salaries paid to Foreign Service officers of class 5, which comprises no consul general and no diplomatic officer of higher grade than that of second secretary. That a minister accredited to a foreign government should receive a salary no larger than that received by a second secretary of legation is an anomaly in the Foreign Service of the United States, which, in the view of the undersigned, should, in fairness to the minister and for the sake of uniformity in the Foreign Service be corrected.

Moreover, the compensation of the minister resident and consul general to Liberia is less than that received by any other foreign representative in Monrovia, none of whom has a higher grade than chargé d'affaires, as those who do not have salaries equal to that of the American representative have the benefit of allotments and perquisites. Thus, in 1925–26, the British consul general and the German consul at Monrovia each received a salary of $7,500 per annum and, in addition, entertainment and household allowances; in 1926–27 the British consul general received $9,272 salary, $2,196 local allowance, amounting to $11,468; more than double the entire compensation of the American minister and consul general, and, in addition thereto, a house is provided for him. The British vice consul, a subordinate official, receives, if married, only about $400 per annum less than the American consul general.

The British Legation, owned and furnished by the British Government, is an elaborate two-story concrete building with 14 rooms and appurtenances. Germany, France, and Spain also provide quarters for their representatives.

The United States has a number of definite interests in Liberia, all of which the American minister must maintain and advance. Liberia began under American auspices, having been colonized by slaves freed in this country. Liberia has always regarded the United States as her next friend and on numerous occasions the United States has employed her good offices to assist Liberia politically, financially, and economically. There are also extensive American missionary interests involving about 100 American missionaries, both white and colored, with an estimated investment of $500,000 and a yearly budget of $300,000. American capital is also entering Liberia on a large scale in the development of rubber plantations. An American concession permits the planting of 1,000,000 acres which is now being developed at the rate of about 20,000 acres per year and at an approximate cost of $1,000,000 annually. There is a $5,000,000 loan to Liberia placed in America and secured by American receivership of customs under the direction of an American bank and assisted by an American financial adviser.

The duties of the American minister resident and consul general are in all respects similar to those performed by other American ministers and may be fairly compared to those performed by such ministers at posts in the smaller Latin-American countries. These ministers all receive $10,000 annually.

Furthermore, with the cost of living at Monrovia for a foreigner being even higher than it is in the United States, it is impossible for the American minister, unless he be a man of large means, to meet the requirements of diplomatic life and his family necessities on the small salary now granted to the post.

A copy of a letter from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, stating that the proposed request is not in conflict with the financial program of the President, is inclosed.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

CONFERENCE OF CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 262, requesting the President to extend to the Republics of America an invitation to attend a conference of conciliation and arbitration to be held at Washington during 1928 or 1929. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to extend to the Republics of America an invitation to attend a conference of conciliation and arbitration to be held at Washington during 1928 or 1929, for the purpose of drawing up a convention for the realization of the principle of arbitration for the pacific solution of their international differences of a juridical nature which was adopted in the resolution passed at the Sixth International Conference of American States.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the expenses of such conference, including salaries in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, rent, printing and binding, printing of official visiting cards, travel and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary, and such other expenses as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of State by reason of such invitation.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PORTER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the inclosed report from the Secretary of State, to the end that legislation may be enacted requesting (1) the President to extend to the Republics of America an invitation to attend a conference of conciliation and arbitration, to be held at Washington during 1928 or 1929, for the purpose of drawing up a convention for the realization of the principle of arbitration for the pacific solution of their international differences of a juridical nature which was adopted in the resolution passed at the Sixth International Conference of American States; (2) the authorization of an appropriation of $60,000 for the expenses of such a conference.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 3, 1928.

STATE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 2, 1928.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President a copy of a resolution passed at the Sixth International Conference of American States recently held at Habana, Cuba. This resolution, which was passed by acclamation in plenary session, condemned war as an instrument of national policy and provided that the Republics of America adopt obligatory arbitration as the means which they will employ for the pacific solution of their international differences of a juridical nature.

The resolution further provided that the Republics of America will meet in Washington within a period of one year for a conference of conciliation and arbitration to draw up a convention for the realization of this principle, with the minimum exceptions which they consider indispensable to safeguard the independence and the sovereignty of the States as well as domestic questions, and also excluding matters relating to the interest or referring to the action of a State not a party to the convention. By this resolution the interested Governments agree to send to the conference mentioned representatives with instructions regarding the maximum and minimum which they will accept with regard to obligatory arbitral jurisdiction. It is further provided that the conventions of conciliation and arbitration which it is hoped will be concluded at the conference will leave open a protocol of progressive arbitration which will permit the development of this beneficial institution to the greatest possible extent.

For the reasons stated in the inclosed resolution it is desired that the Congress of the United States be asked to request the President to extend to the Republics of America an invitation to attend a conference of conciliation and arbitration, to be held at Washington during 1928, for the purpose of drawing up a convention for the realization of the principle of arbitration for the pacific solution of their international differences of a juridical nature, and to authorize an appropriation of $60,000 for the expenses of such a conference.

Respectfully submitted.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF ENTOMOLOGY

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 152, authorizing and requesting the President to extend invitations to foreign governments to be represented by delegates at the International Congress of Entomology to be held in the United States in 1928.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This resolution is on the House Calendar. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to extend invitations to foreign governments to be represented by delegates at the International Congress of Entomology to be held in the United States in 1928.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PORTER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the message of the President and the letter of the Secretary of State, which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, inclosing a recommendation from the Secretary of Agriculture that the Congress be requested to adopt a resolution authorizing and requesting the President to invite foreign governments to be represented by delegates at the International Congress of Entomology, to be held in the United States in 1928.

It will be noticed that because of the close relationship between entomology and agriculture, the Department of Agriculture is especially interested in the international aspects of this science, which it considers of very great importance to this country. As it would seem, therefore, that the participation of foreign governments in the congress mentioned would be in the public interest, I recommend to Congress the passage of the joint resolution. No appropriation is requested.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 19, 1927.

The PRESIDENT:

With a view to the submission of the request to Congress, if the President approve thereof, the undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President a copy of a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture recommending the adoption by the Congress of a joint resolution, a draft of which he incloses, authorizing and requesting the President to extend invitations to foreign governments to be represented by delegates at the International Congress of Entomology to be held in the United States in 1928. No appropriation is requested.

In explanation of Secretary Jardine's letter, it may be stated that at his request the American diplomatic officers were authorized in June last to deliver on behalf of the American organization committee of the International Congress of Entomology, which will be held at Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., in 1928, an invitation addressed by that committee to foreign governments, but to make it clear to those governments that the Government of the United States had no connection with the congress.

This action was taken on the strength of the following statement by Secretary Jardine:

"Because of the close relationship between entomology and agriculture, this department [the Department of Agriculture] is especially interested in the international aspects of this science. It considers them of very great importance to this country."

Respectfully submitted.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 19, 1927.

INTER-AMERICAN HIGHWAY ON THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 259, authorizing assistance in the construction of an inter-American highway on the Western Hemisphere.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This resolution is on the House Calendar, and the Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Sixth International Conference of American States, at Habana, Cuba, resolved as follows:

"To recommend to the Pan American Congress of Highways, which will meet at Rio de Janeiro in July of the present year, the consideration and adoption of agreements that will be conducive to the construction of a longitudinal communication highway to traverse the continent, taking into consideration and deciding all questions relative to studies, route, branch connections, technical and economical cooperation of the different countries, and other matters included in the determination of this problem.

"The Pan American Union is intrusted with the compilation of information and the preparation of projects which will serve to give effect to this resolution, submitting this material in due time to the Pan American Congress of Highways."

Resolved, etc., That the Government of the United States should manifest the utmost interest in the purposes of the aforesaid resolution, and that in order to promote the speedy realization of these purposes and objects the President is requested to direct the several agencies of the Government, and they are hereby authorized to lend such cooperation and assistant as may be feasible and appropriate, with a view to having the matter thoroughly considered by the approaching conference; and he is further requested to advise Congress of any conclusions reached and any action which may be suggested by the conference.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. On page 2, in line 8, strike out the word "assistant" and insert the word "assistance."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PORTER: On page 2, in line 8, strike out the word "assistant" and insert in lieu thereof the word "assistance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on House Joint Resolution 259 just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the resolution just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this short joint resolution, if enacted, will be the beginning, on the part of our Government, of the fulfillment of an international dream of 50 years; that is, the construction of an inter-American highway connecting the nations of North America, Central and South America.

James G. Blaine dreamed of it when he was Secretary of State in 1881. The Pan American Congress which he then planned was realized in 1889 by an act of Congress passed in 1888. Speaking before that Congress, which met in Washington, among other things he said:

We believe that we should be drawn together more closely by the highways of the seas, and that at no distant date the railway systems of the North and South will meet upon an isthmus and connect by land routes the political and commercial capitals of all America.

In transmitting the report of the first Pan American conference on such railway communication, President Harrison said:

It should not be forgotten that it is possible to travel by land from Washington to the southernmost capital of South America, and that the opening of railroad communication with these friendly States will give to them and to us facilities for intercourse and the exchange of trade that are of special value. The work contemplated is vast, but entirely practicable. * * * I do not hesitate to recommend that Congress make the very moderate appropriation for surveys suggested by the conference and authorize the appointment of commissioners and the detail of engineer officers to direct and conduct the necessary preliminary surveys.

The dreams of those days were never realized. But more recently they have been revived and they are now presented in the form of a highway for automobiles, an inter-American highway stretching from the snows of Canada to the snowfields of southernmost South America, broadly speaking, from the Arctic regions of the North to the Antarctic regions of the south. What was not possible to realize in the form of a railroad we believe is now possible of realization in the form of highways for automobiles and motor trucks.

This short and simple joint resolution, as I have already said, if passed will be the beginning of what may be a great fulfillment. In this resolution we create no new boards or commissions, of which we have already too many, nor do we authorize any new expenditures of which also we have already too many. It is provided in this joint resolution that the President of the United States shall employ the existing agencies of the Government, such as the State Department and the National Highway Commission under the Department of Agriculture, to gather such data as may be useful in our participation in the pending international conferences.

The resolution was drawn up in response to resolutions passed at the recent Sixth International Conference of American States held at Habana, Cuba. The resolutions there passed are as follows:

To recommend to the Pan American Congress of Highways, which will meet at Rio de Janeiro in July of the present year, the consideration and adoption of agreements that will be conducive to the construction of a longitudinal communication highway to traverse the continent, taking into consideration and deciding all questions relative to studies, routes, branch connections, technical and economic cooperation of the different countries, and other matters included in the determination of this problem.

The Pan American Union is intrusted with the compilation of information and the preparation of projects which will serve to give effect to this resolution, submitting this material in due time to the Pan American Congress of Highways.

The congress of highways which is referred to as to meet in Rio de Janeiro in July of this year has been postponed until July of next year, which will, in view of this new matter, be a more convenient date for all concerned. It will afford time for the Pan American Union, which is "intrusted with the compilation of information and the preparation of projects which will give effect to this resolution," to assemble material pertinent to the ensuing discussions. In accordance with these resolutions the agenda of the congress at Rio de Janeiro will be extended, and it is hoped that this particular subject will be one of the most important considered in that meeting.

The joint resolution which we are asking Congress to pass will make it possible for our Government to supply our delegates to that congress with data and information which will enable them to participate in the proceedings more effectively.

It is also an expression of what is called our "utmost interest" in the whole international project, and also an assurance not only of our willingness but of our eagerness to help in so worthy an undertaking. It seems to me there is nothing wiser or finer that we can do at this time to further a project that is of increasing interest among the people of all the States of the two American continents.

Much might be said bearing upon the influence of such an inter-American highway upon the commerce among the American States, north and south, and much more on the effect of such a highway in the promotion of amity and good will among the nations affected. Nations that are now separated will be brought closer together. People that now sometimes misunderstand each other will be brought into better mutual understandings.

Along this highway there will be a constant and increasing interchange of ideas as well as an interchange of commerce. As an evidence of good will and a promoter of amity among the nations that this highway will touch, the project under consideration will be worth all it costs and much more. The possibilities, in whatever way we may look at the matter, are so vast and so significant that we are warranted in taking the preliminary action which is outlined in the resolution which we are submitting for the action of the House.

In closing, I want to call attention to the influence that this proposed highway may have, and no doubt will have, upon aviation. The highway will be of such ample construction, if the tentative plans are carried out, that it will afford safe landing places for airplanes that may be forced to land. It will make aviation comparatively safe, for it will afford not only such landing places, but it will serve as a marker for those who use the air.

Recently Col. Charles A. Lindbergh traversed portions of the proposed route over tractless wastes. What he did was an evidence of his genius in the air. It will not be possible for all who will fly to bring to their task the skill of a Lindbergh. This highway will go far to supply such deficiencies.

In the years to come we may visualize whole argosies of airplanes passing from the North to the South, and coming up from the South to the North. Aviation is still in its infancy. I believe it will be a realization beyond all our dreams in the years to come. In constructing the proposed highway we will be making a substantial contribution to that future.

The joint resolution which we are submitting is fraught with such vast possibilities that its passage may mark the beginning not only of a new era but of a new dispensation. However much some may still be thinking that this is only a dream, it will be a realization.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, the House Joint Resolution 239, which has just passed, is one of the most important and constructive enactments that has come before the Congress at the present session. It constitutes, as my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE], declared during consideration of the bill, the fulfillment of an international dream of 50 years. This measure contemplates the construction of an inter-American highway connecting the nations of North America and Central and South America.

As far back as 1881 James G. Blaine, then Secretary of State, urged the building of such a highway between the United States and the countries to which I have referred, and as a member of the Cabinet he vigorously advocated the project before the Pan American Congress, when he said:

> We believe that we should be drawn together more closely by the highways of the seas, and that at no distant day the railway systems of the North and South will meet upon an isthmus and connect by land routes the political and commercial capitals of all America.

The statesmen of those days realized and recognized the commercial and the material advantage that must necessarily accrue to all the contiguous territory, but nothing came of their then pioneer efforts. But the seed was sown in fertile soil, although it has taken many years to reach fruition. The evidence indicated to-day by the unanimous passage of this bill shows that there is a very substantial appreciation of what the highway will mean to present and future generations. This great inter-American highway will reach from Canada in the north of us to the extreme and southern section of South America. It will furnish for the south countries what the railroads have done for us and will throw open a magnificent avenue of trade that will inure to the commercial advantages of all concerned.

It was my honor to be appointed by our distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], a member of the subcommittee to hold hearings on the bill. Together with my colleagues the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]. This subcommittee held a number of conferences with representatives of the State Department, since the matter referred to affects our relations with other countries, and representatives of the National Highway Commission, as also with many others who are naturally interested and affected. After these repeated meetings our subcommittee made a report to the full Committee on Foreign Affairs in favor of the bill herewith presented. It will be observed that in our resolution no new or expensive bureau machinery is created. Instead it authorizes the President to use the existing departments of the Government for the purpose of collecting data bearing upon the suggested enterprise. This important work can be expeditiously and capably handled by the State Department, and the good roads division operating very effectively in the Department of Agriculture. I quote the following from our report:

> The project under consideration involves so many foreign governments that in the opinion of the committee reporting out this resolution, the procedure should be by the cooperation of all the governments concerned, rather than by the action of any one of them. Fortunately, the action of the Sixth International Conference of American States, already referred to, forms a basis for such cooperation as well as for the action contemplated in this resolution. The resolutions passed at Habana on this subject are as follows:
> "To recommend to the Pan American Congress of Highways, which will meet at Rio de Janeiro in July of the present year, the consideration and adoption of agreements that will be conducive to the construction of a longitudinal communication highway to traverse the continent, taking into consideration and deciding all questions relative to studies, route, branch connections, technical and economic cooperation of the different countries, and other matters included in the determination of this problem.
> "The Pan American Union is entrusted with the compilation of information and the preparation of projects which will serve to give effect to this resolution, submitting this material in due time to the Pan American Congress of Highways."

My distinguished colleague on the subcommittee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE], very wisely summed up the exact situation in his speech the other day when he offered the following observations:

> Along this highway there will be a constant and increasing interchange of ideas as well as an interchange of commerce. As an evidence of good will and a promoter of amity among the nations that this highway will touch, the project under consideration will be worth all it costs and much more. The possibilities, in whatever way we may look at the matter, are so vast and so significant that we are warranted in taking the preliminary action which is outlined in the resolution which we are submitting for the action of the House.

I shall always look back with pride and gratification to the small but important part it was my privilege to play in helping to initiate this great highway movement among our neighbors to the south and the United States.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the several bills and resolutions were passed to-day and lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I doubt the wisdom of granting such a request on Calendar Wednesday. If Calendar Wednesday business has been finished, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is a bill to come up under a special rule.

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Speaker, I will say that if there is any objection I will change my request and make it for to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's request can be granted only by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be well to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business for the rest of to-day and find out what we are going to do for the balance of the day. I ask unanimous consent that further business under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with for to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that further Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with for to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we were informed a few moments ago that in all likelihood the Newton bill amending the Webb-Pomerene export law might be called up.

Mr. SNELL. I am doing this for the purpose of getting your bill before the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We do not want it brought up to-day.

Mr. SNELL. That is all right, but some determination should be made as to business for the rest of to-day.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have conferred with the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SNELL. It can only come up by unanimous consent?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly, and that is why I do not want to interfere with Calendar Wednesday business. If Calendar Wednesday business has been finished we would have an opportunity to-day to permit speeches to be made and then take up our bill to-morrow.

Mr. SNELL. I am not going to object to the gentleman from West Virginia having 30 minutes, but I thought we should dispense with further Calendar Wednesday business before that permission was granted.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand the gentleman from Alabama would object to the consideration of the Newton bill to-day, and I would join in the objection.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman from New York is speaking for himself and evidently for the gentleman from Alabama. But so far as I am concerned personally, and so far as the author of this bill is personally concerned, we are ready to go ahead this afternoon; but, of course, I do not want to inconvenience any of the members of the committee who are not ready to go ahead.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, the gentleman knows that if he objects to my request we would either have to go ahead with the call of the committees or adjourn.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have several speeches scheduled for to-morrow; why not have them now.

Mr. SNELL. We could not take those matters up unless we dispensed with business under Calendar Wednesday. We would either have to adjourn or call the committees.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall not object to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday, and then we can take the next step as we come to it.

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] on yesterday to ask unanimous consent that the special orders for yesterday, consideration of the Newton rubber bill being one of them, should go over until to-morrow. This was granted by unanimous consent and those of us who desire to present some views in opposition to this bill were preparing to go ahead to-morrow, and we are not ready to-day. That would be the reason for any objection.

Mr. SNELL. I do not want to be unfair about the proposition. That was the request granted yesterday. We expected at that time that the Committee on Foreign Affairs would take up all the afternoon. Of course, we do not want to "spring" anything on the House, but we thought we had better not waste the balance of the day, if possible.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I would like to point out to the gentleman—I came in the Chamber in the middle of this discussion—the British Government is to-day trying to decide whether or not they shall continue the restriction scheme. We will know to-morrow the attitude of the British Government on the Stevenson restriction plan, and it would be far wiser in view of that fact that we proceed to-morrow, because the whole situation may be changed at that time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the American Congress is going to defer consideration of legislation simply at the behest of some unauthorized association or committee representing some function in connection with the British Government. We are legislating here for the American people.

Mr. BLACK of New York. The gentleman misunderstands me. The whole basis of this bill is the Stevenson restriction plan, and the British Government is trying to pass on whether or not that scheme shall be continued. The entire argument back of this bill is based on what another government is doing or has done.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is entirely in error. This legislation would be perfectly proper and perfectly feasible and perfectly in order and would be needed if there were no such plan as the Stevenson plan in existence. We are taking in other things besides rubber. We are taking in sisal from which twine is made and which is very important in connection with this bill. There are several other things, Mr. Speaker, and I submit that the request ought to be acted upon.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he represents the British Government.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I do not, and I do not represent a lot of "rubber patriots."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that further Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to propound a question to my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. The bulletin board does not indicate what business will be up for consideration to-morrow, Friday, and Saturday. Can the gentleman give us any idea of the matters to be taken up on those days?

Mr. SNELL. It was explained yesterday in the House that we expected to-morrow to take up the Newton rubber bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And now the gentleman expects to take that up at this time.

Mr. SNELL. We thought we could take that bill up now if we could get unanimous consent and consider it this afternoon and finish its consideration to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Can the gentleman give us any information as to the business coming up during the remainder of the week?

Mr. SNELL. Friday we would expect to take up the Private Calendar, and there has been nothing definitely arranged for Saturday.

Mr. POU. Would the gentleman from New York consent to resuming consideration of the Private Calendar to-day?

Mr. SNELL. I do not think the gentlemen who are looking after the Private Calendar are ready to go ahead to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask for the regular order, which is the calling of the committees.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in order at this time except to call the committee or move to adjourn.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; there is. One Member of Congress can ask unanimous consent of the House as well as another, and the gentleman from West Virginia has submitted a unanimous-consent request, and unless some one objects, the gentleman is entitled to have his request put.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia? After a pause. The Chair hears none and recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia for 30 minutes.

Mr. ENGLAND was recognized.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield for me to make an inquiry?

Mr. ENGLAND. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, may it be understood so that we may not wait for developments that the Newton bill will not be called up to-day, but will follow the order of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can only be called up by unanimous consent or by dispensing with Calendar Wednesday business under the rules.

Mr. SNELL. And we can not bring in a rule at the present time.

Mr. DYER. We can adjourn.

Mr. SNELL. Either adjourn or call the committees.

Mr. DYER. The Judiciary Committee is ready to proceed on the call of the Calendar of Committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with there are only two things to do; one is to call the roll of committees under the Calendar Wednesday rule and the other to adjourn.

RIVER IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, recently our Government launched upon an extensive program of river and harbor improvements, but this governmental activity should be increased many fold.

No money is being spent that means so much to our commercial life, our national prosperity, and better and higher civilization. The railroads should aid rather than oppose the improvements of our inland waterway system for better transportation facilities. My information is that where rivers have been improved paralleling railroads that, without exception, there has been no reduction in the freight returns of such railroads.

The development of river transportation increases new business—creates large volumes of new traffic and while the railroads may and will lose freight transportation, yet they will gain more than they lose by this large increase in business activities actuated by this internal improvement.

Enlarged transportation facilities universally produce increased business activities and by reason thereof adds largely to the product to be shipped to market.

Permit me to refer to the Monongahela River. The headwater navigation of this river is at Fairmont, W. Va., 126 miles from Pittsburgh. The improvement of this river was completed in 1898. There are 15 locks and dams constructed on that river, at a cost, I am told, of approximately $8,000,000. Nearly all the freight carried on this river is coal. The freight transportation on said river is 24,000,000 tons annually.

The savings on water shipment would not be less than 50 cents a ton. The annual savings on the freight shipments on this river would be $12,000,000, or approximately $4,000,000 more than the total cost of the improvement.

In the light of these statistics it could not be successfully contended that from the viewpoint of the public river improvements do not pay.

River improvements cause a revival of business in all endeavors and furnishes a cheaper commodity to the consuming public. In my humble judgment river improvement will do more to solve the perplexing problem of the high cost of living and farm relief than anything that could be done.

This country is suffering sorely from high transportation costs, and the proper utilization of our waterways as freight carriers will largely decrease this enormous cost.

The coal industry is almost prostrate. The agricultural sections are demanding farm relief and from the information received there is much merit in this demand.

The coal producers and their thousands of miners are crying out for relief and anyone familiar with the coal industry will agree that coal relief is needed as well as farm relief.

This inland waterway system as it progresses will afford a great measure of relief to every section which has coal deposits in merchantable qualities.

One of the greatest difficulties of the coal industry is overproduction. The improvement of our inland-waterway system will broaden the coal markets and cheapen its transportation cost, thereby affording this industry a very distinct relief.

The President, several years ago, appointed a commission to ascertain the benefits of the improvement of our inland waterways. This commission after taking volumes of testimony and otherwise gathering information, reported that the water routes properly located not only afforded the advantages and best methods of transportation, but that they are likewise the natural competitors and effective regulators of railway transportation.

Another commission was later appointed and reported that the network of canals through the countries of Holland, Germany, and France play a great part in the economic life of the people unlike any other form of transportation. The limit of the appropriation made by Congress for this purpose should be the largest amount which could be economically expended.

Time is required for the completion of the improvement of this great inland waterway system, and for that reason activities along this line should be aggressive.

I understand the policy of the engineers and Congress is to improve first the rivers which afford the greatest opportunities for tonnage to be transported over same. This undoubtedly is a sound policy. I wish to call your attention to the much-needed improvement of the Great Kanawha River in West Virginia.

On the 10th day of February, 1928, I introduced a bill providing for the authorization of the improvement of the Great Kanawha River, which bill is now pending before the Rivers and Harbors Committee. The committee has taken favorable action on the authorization of this project. On February 25, 1928, the Secretary of War, by virtue of the rivers and harbors act, approved September 22, 1922, transmitted to the Speaker of the House, the report and recommendation of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, relating to a survey and improvement of the Great Kanawha River. This report recommends that the present obsolete Dams Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5 be replaced with two locks and dams suitable for adequate transportation purposes. This report among other things said:

> After due consideration of the above-mentioned report, I concur in the views of the Board of Engineers for rivers and harbors. Some of the coal tributary to the Kanawha River is of the highest grade obtainable for steam production. At Charleston there is already a considerable industrial development and a number of new plants are being built. In addition to the through movement of coal to Ohio River points, the total of which now amounts to some 35 per cent of the coal moved on the Ohio River, it is probable that the industries at Charleston will call for a large tonnage with a material saving over the cost of transportation by rail. Further diversions of traffic from the river to the railroads may result if the present unsatisfactory navigation facilities in the upper river are not corrected. Since the most valuable coal mines are adjacent to the upper river, it appears that the continued economic success of the improvement below Charleston must be considered dependent in a considerable measure on the navigation facilities of the upper river.
> The possibilities of power development at the proposed new dams are sufficient to interest certain power companies who have shown a desire to enter into an agreement with the United States for the use of the water for that purpose. The development of power is not feasible at the existing dams. Many tons of coal would be saved for other purposes by using for power the water now being wasted. The saving in transportation costs on a movement of a million and a half tons, added to the estimated savings in cost of operation and maintenance and the income from water rental, shows a direct saving in excess of the annual carrying charges.
> The increased water shipments of coal to Cincinnati or other Ohio River points would result in a still further saving to the lower Kanawha and to the Ohio Rivers. * * * It is not impossible that eventually the Kanawha River may show an increase in tonnage somewhat on the basis attained on the Monongahela River. I therefore report that modification of the existing project for the Kanawha River, W. Va., is deemed advisable so as to provide for the replacement of locks and dams Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5 with two locks and dams at an estimated cost of $3,500,000, with $18,000 annually for operation and maintenance, which is $30,000 less than under the existing project. The location and design of the locks and dams should be left to the discretion of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGLAND. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Is it not a fact that the proposed improvements to the Kanawha River enter the coal fields far greater than that of the Monongahela?

Mr. ENGLAND. Much greater, and I will come to that later. The report further says:

> Recent economic studies of the Kanawha River improvement show that it has been a profitable investment of public funds. An increase in future commerce seems assured.

During 1925, 35 per cent of the coal moved on the Ohio River had its origin on the Kanawha River. It seems probable that in addition to the through movement of coal to the Ohio River points, the existing industries at Charleston, together with new chemical plants attracted to coal areas of this nature, will call for the movement of a large tonnage, with a material saving over the cost of transportation by rail.

West Virginia produces annually from 125,000,000 to 145,000,000 tons of coal. We are told by competent geologists that at the present rate of production it would take more than 1,200 years to mine all the coal in West Virginia.

West Virginia prospers as the coal industry prospers. Depression in the coal business produces depression in all other businesses. The Great Kanawha River runs through the counties of Fayette, Kanawha, Putnam, and Mason and empties into the Ohio River at Point Pleasant, about halfway between Cincinnati and Pittsburgh. Of the 92 miles of the river which is navigable, 52 is underlaid with coal of merchantable thickness. This valley furnishes barely sufficient room for the New York Central Railroad on the north bank and the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway on the south bank, while below Charleston the valley broadens into a beautiful, rolling agricultural country.

The river is now equipped with 10 locks and dams, 4 of which are above Charleston and 6 below. The dams above Charleston were built between 1880 and 1887, and the ones below between 1887 and 1898. The lock chambers of these dams above Charleston will only accommodate two barges and those below four. The channel depth is hardly 6 feet at pool stage. The dams above Charleston have become obsolete and should be replaced with two large stationary dams equipped with the largest lock chambers feasible and practicable to the Great Kanawha River, with a 9-foot channel depth, thus enabling the coal and other industrial concerns to equip themselves with modern facilities and begin river shipments on a large scale, which can not now be done under the present existing conditions.

A resolution adopted by the Kanawha Coal Operators Association October 21, 1926, among other things, said:

> Many years ago, and at the time when only a 6-foot stage was contemplated on the Ohio River, a series of 10 movable dams, equipped with small lock chambers and only providing a 6-foot stage of water, was installed on our own Great Kanawha River, and which facilities form our only present access to the Ohio River. The cost of operating under the present system and with the present facilities is about six times as great as the cost of operating on the Ohio River. In other words, the Great Kanawha River as equipped is a narrow-gauge connection in a standard-gauge main line.

A resolution adopted by the Winding Gulf Coal Operators Association recently, among other things, said:

The Ohio Valley Improvement Association, which has been the inspiration and promoting force in the canalization of the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo for the last 32 years, in its 1926 annual convention at Paducah, Ky., being advised of these facts as to the Great Kanawha River, unqualifiedly recommended and indorsed the immediate standardization of the Great Kanawha River with the Ohio River.

The Charleston Chamber of Commerce of the city of Charleston in a resolution recently adopted by it, among other things, said:

That the board of directors of the Charleston Chamber of Commerce strongly and vigorously indorse the improvement of the Great Kanawha River from the head of navigation to its mouth so as to provide a 9-foot stage of water and the largest capacity lock chambers permitted by flow of water and width of river; that this chamber pledges its continued indorsement of and support to the United States engineer in charge of Great Kanawha River district and instructs its committee to cooperate fully with him.

Practically all the chambers of commerce and the different civic organizations in this valley have adopted strong resolutions setting forth cogent reasons why this river should be improved for better navigation.

This river is now being utilized in a small way in the shipment of coal and other products to market, but to great disadvantage. The Ohio River is now equipped with a 9-foot stage and lock chambers 110 feet by 630, which will accommodate 16 Kanawha River barges and the steamboat. The Mississippi and Ohio Rivers need the tonnage for shipment in order to justify the improvement of these rivers.

The Kanawha River can furnish this tonnage in greater quantities, perhaps, in proportion to its length, than any other river in the Mississippi Basin. According to the West Virginia geological survey there is approximately 18,000,000,000 tons of workable coal within the watershed of the Kanawha River, which is sufficient, it is claimed by geologists and engineers, to lay down a layer of coal as thick as Washington Monument is high over the entire District of Columbia. It is said by the same eminent authority that the coal in this valley is sufficient to maintain the output of the entire State of West Virginia for 125 years.

Perhaps we may be able to grasp in our minds better as to the quantity of coal produced in this valley, when I inform you that according to the preliminary figures of the Federal Bureau of Mines, West Virginia exceeded Pennsylvania in the production of bituminous coal for 1927 more than 21,000,000 tons.

More than 35,000,000 tons of coal was shipped out of this valley by rail in 1926. The tonnage of coal shipped over the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway in 1920 was 28,000,000 tons, and in 1926, 50,000,000 tons. A substantial part of this increase came from this valley. The quality of this coal as shown by chemical analysis is the finest in the world. We find there the smokeless, by-product, gas, splint, and black coals which are now being marketed around the world and are the only known coals which successfully compete with the Cardiff coal of Wales, upon which England has built her great export trade.

Neither England nor Germany have such coals as the domestic and splint coals found in this valley to offer their very substantial overseas trade.

The coal in this valley has proven to be indispensable to a diversified industry, being of a unique character and quality not found elsewhere in this country, and especially is this true of the smokeless or New River coal. The New River Coal Operators' Association, in a resolution adopted by it, among other things, said:

With cheap river transportation available, not only will the Panama Canal be more economically served by the way of the rivers, New Orleans, and the Gulf of Mexico, but New Orleans can be made the base for a great coal port for American coal in the world market.

Because of cheap water transportation in England and Germany, American coal now reaches the seaboard handicapped by a heavy land freight not incurred by foreign coals, and the American producer has been unable to develop a large export business in coal, although England alone exports some 75,000,000 tons per annum, and such an export business would tend to stabilize and adjust many of the problems confronting the American coal industry.

Water transportation is peculiarly adapted to the economical transportation of coal, and with this great system of inland waterways completed it is fair to assume that the rivers and their cheaper transportation rates will transport a very large portion of the new coal business developed in this valley.

During the year 1926, out of 142,775 carloads of freight shipped into this valley, 79,774 came from the West and the residue from the East. A very large portion of these products were susceptible to river transportation. As soon as our inland-waterways system is completed and its system of transportation completely organized and developed, these incoming shipments will increase in volume, perhaps to 750,000 tons annually. When adequate water transportation is afforded, within a few years thereafter the shipments of coal out of the Great Kanawha Valley will exceed 10,000,000 tons annually. The freight on river shipments will be at least 50 cents per ton cheaper than railway, thus saving the consumer $5,000,000 annually upon coal transported. The two stationary dams, Nos. 2 and 3, do not furnish a sufficient amount of water in the vicinity of Mount Carbon, a logical outlet from the great smokeless-coal fields; also the present height of the lock walls at these two dams do not permit the operation of the locks when the stage at Kanawha Falls above said dams is 12 or more feet. The stage at Kanawha Falls is frequently more than 12 feet.

This valley has also developed a very large area of oil and gas territory, the average daily production of oil being 8,815 barrels.

Large areas of mixed hardwood forest are still available in this valley, and vast areas cut over 25 to 50 years ago are growing and producing new timber, thus insuring a continuing supply for the future.

Among the many other raw materials of the valley are found salt, glass sand, fire clay, and kaolin. The development of the great chemical industry in the valley is rapidly bringing Charleston forward as the recognized chemical center of the United States.

Charleston has the largest ax factory and glass plant in the world. The manufacturing establishments in this valley, of different kind and character, are numerous.

The Great Kanawha River, with equal river transportation facilities, will in a short time equal, if not excel, the annual tonnage of shipments of the Monongahela River. The Kanawha River contains an abundance of water. According to General Deakyne, in low water the natural flow in this river is more than seven times greater than that in the Monongahela River. The natural resources of this valley are almost inexhaustible. This valley is coming to be a veritable hive of industry. Charleston is destined to be the center of the greatest industrial section in the world. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] may now have 10 minutes to address the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] 10 minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER] 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAPES). The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] may now have 10 minutes to address the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] 10 minutes, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER] 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TO AUTHORIZE THE PRESIDENT TO VETO SEPARATE ITEMS IN APPROPRIATION BILLS

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am going to confine my remarks to a proposed amendment to the Constitution authorizing the President of the United States to veto separate items of an appropriation bill. There are similar provisions in the various State constitutions, and I have written the governors of the various States and have their replies discussing the subject very briefly, which I want permission to include in my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing communications from governors of different States. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, for the purpose of making an announcement, I want to say that the special orders for to-morrow for the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] will be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that will be the understanding.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I wanted to bring to your attention a resolution which I have introduced (H. J. Res. 70) proposing an amendment to section

7, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, permitting the President of the United States to disapprove any item or appropriation of any bill passed by Congress. The resolution is as follows:

Amend section 7, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, by adding the following paragraph at the end of said section:

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate making appropriations of money embracing distinct items shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approves, he shall sign it, but if he disapproves the bill or any item or appropriation therein contained, he shall communicate such disapproval, with his reasons therefor, to the House in which the bill shall have originated. All items not disapproved shall have the force and effect of law according to the original provision of the bill. Any item or items so disapproved shall be void, unless repassed by a two-thirds vote, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in section 7, Article I, in reference to other bills."

I have been greatly interested in this reform since the beginning of my service in Congress.

I am in favor of the Budget system and I voted for it. I made a speech in favor of it when the first bill was up for consideration.

The Budget system holds the administration responsible for the balance of receipts and disbursements of public moneys. Annual estimates are made and presented through the Bureau of the Budget of the revenues received from all sources and the estimated expenditures. Frequently amendments are added by one branch or the other of Congress to appropriation bills and the President, under the Constitution, is compelled to approve or veto the entire bill. If this amendment were adopted, he could veto any separate item of any appropriation bill. If an objectionable amendment were added or if any item estimated for by the Bureau of the Budget were too greatly increased, if this amendment were adopted, it would not necessitate vetoing the entire bill or the reconvening of Congress in session to make another appropriation for that particular branch or department of Government.

I think every Member who has experienced any length of service in the House will call to mind many items added or increased, particularly in the closing days of the short session of Congress, that have been the subject of severe criticism. My judgment is that every item of an appropriation bill should stand upon its own merit. It is unfair to sandwich items of doubtful merit which can not be justified in an appropriation bill.

The proposed amendment is similar to the constitutional provisions of many of the States, and I might add, copied from the provision of the Oklahoma constitution. I have addressed letters to the governors of all of the States, inclosing a copy of the proposed amendment making inquiry as to whether each State has a similar provision and asking for any constructive criticism or suggestion with reference to it. From the replies received and from investigations made, I find that nearly all of the most recently adopted or revised State constitutions have a similar provision, and almost without exception the provision is commended by each governor as a step in the interest of economy.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. I regret that I was not here at the beginning of the gentleman's remarks; will the gentleman, in a few words, state his proposed amendment?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have introduced a proposed amendment to the Constitution modeled after the constitutions of most of the States of the Union which, if adopted, would authorize the President of the United States to veto separate items of an appropriation bill. I explained that I had written to the governors of all the States and had received replies from 37 of the 48 governors and I have included here excerpts of letters of most of the governors from whom I have received replies, all of them without exception commending it as a good amendment and favoring its adoption as an amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does not the gentleman find that all of the more modern State constitutions, adopted, say, within the last 20 or 25 years, authorize the governor to veto items in appropriation bills?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true; and it is true of the gentleman's own State, Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I served in the last constitutional convention held in Virginia in 1901 and 1902, and we departed from the old constitutional provision which did not give that power, and conferred that power upon the governor.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have a letter from Governor Byrd, of Virginia, and he very strongly recommends such a provision.

Mr. AYRES. Does not the gentleman feel that under the Budget system as we now have it the President has sufficient power over appropriations without the Constitution granting to him the power to veto any item in an appropriation bill after it has passed Congress?

Mr. HASTINGS. I discussed the budget system in four of the States—New York, Maryland, West Virginia, and Utah. There is a similar provision in each of those States that where the budget is submitted the legislature can not increase it, nor can it add any new or separate items. In New York, for example, the governor is permitted to veto separate items.

With the permission of the House, I am herewith inserting the replies received, for the reason that some of them contain suggestions which should be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary and by the Congress.

Gov. George W. P. Hunt, of Arizona, heartily indorses the proposed amendment and adds:

That provision is in our constitution, which is acknowledged to be the most modern in the United States, with all apologies to the State of Oklahoma.

Gov. C. C. Young, of California, advises that the governor of that State is permitted to either veto or reduce an amount of separate items in any appropriation bill. He states:

In my judgment this has worked very well and everyone is satisfied with it.

He suggests, however, that there has been some criticism against the provision for reducing the amount of an appropriation.

B. T. Poxson, secretary to the Governor of Colorado, states that the recent Supreme Court decision had made it impossible for the governor to veto separate items of an appropriation bill where they were linked up with the other items. He states, however:

If it had been possible for the governor to veto separate items he could have eliminated several unnecessary amounts from nearly every department of the State, and in this way could have brought the appropriation within the estimated revenues of the State.

Gov. John H. Trumbull, of Connecticut, states that an amendment was adopted to the Connecticut State constitution in November, 1924, authorizing the governor to disapprove separate items of an appropriation bill and comments as follows:

Prior to my first session as governor the same situation existed in Connecticut that now exists nationally—namely, the governor was compelled to accept the budget bill as a whole or veto it in toto.

And after advising of the amendment adopted in 1924 adds:

I am heartily in accord with your bill allowing the President to veto certain items in the Budget bill.

Gov. H. C. Baldridge, of Idaho, advises that that State does not have such a provision in its State constitution, but commends it as meritorious.

The legislative reference bureau, Congressional Library, in connection with the matter refers to section 11, article 4, of the constitution of the State of Idaho as follows:

The governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations for money, embracing distinct items, and the part or parts approved shall become a law.

Gov. John Hammill, of Iowa, after expressing regret that that State does not have such a provision in its constitution, states:

To my mind it is a movement in the right direction, and an executive certainly should have a right to veto any portion of an appropriation bill as distinguished from vetoing the entire bill.

Gov. Len Small, of Illinois, advises that a similar provision was adopted as a part of the Illinois State constitution in 1884, and states:

The purpose of this amendment was to enlarge the veto power by authorizing the governor to veto items in appropriation bills. This power has been exercised on numerous occasions and apparently has met with general approval.

P. H. Wolfard, secretary to the Governor of Indiana, advises that the constitution of that State does not contain such a provision.

Gov. L. G. Hardman, of Georgia, invites attention to the fact that Georgia has such an item in its constitution, and comments as follows:

The power to veto any one or more items seems to me a wise provision, and so far as I am informed it has met with the approval of the people of Georgia.

Gov. John W. Martin, of Florida, advises that the constitution of that State, section 18, article 4, has a provision authorizing the governor to disapprove separate items of the appropriation bills.

Gov. Ben S. Paulen, of Kansas, states that the Kansas constitution, amended in 1904, authorizes the governor to veto separate items of appropriation bills, and adds:

It occurs to me that the resolution suggested by you should be adopted by Congress.

W. A. Ponder, secretary to the Governor of Louisiana, writes that the constitution of that State does not contain a provision allowing the governor to veto any separate item in an appropriation bill. However, the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress reports that section 16, Article V, of the constitution of Louisiana has the following provision:

The governor shall have the power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations for money embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be law, and the item or items of appropriation disapproved shall be void unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over veto.

C. F. Morrison, secretary to the Governor of Maine, while advising that the constitution of that State contains no such provision, states as follows:

However, the governor firmly believes in such a proposition for both State and Nation.

Gov. Albert C. Ritchie, of Maryland, writes:

Prior to the adoption in this State of the budget amendment, the constitution authorized the governor to veto separate items of the appropriation bill. This was always regarded as a most desirable and important provision. It is no longer necessary, however, because under our system the governor now submits his budget to the legislature and the legislature can reduce or eliminate items, but can not add new items. Consequently there is no more occasion in this State for the governor to veto separate items of the budget bill.

You will observe the difference between the law in Maryland and the Federal law. Congress can add to or increase the items estimated by the Bureau of the Budget, whereas in Maryland the legislature can only reduce.

Gov. Fred W. Green, of Michigan, comments as follows:

We have this provision in the constitution of this State and it seems that it is no more subject to abuse than the other system. In other words, without it the legislature may tie the hands of the executive on the question of appropriations, whereas if this amendment were adopted the executive may exercise his proper functions in the vetoing of specific items without imperiling the measure in which they are included.

Gov. Theodore Christianson, of Minnesota, strongly commends the proposition in a letter reviewing the merits of such a provision. He says, in part:

Answering your letter of the 17th instant, I will say that the constitution of Minnesota contains a provision which makes it possible for the governor to veto separate items of appropriation bills without vetoing the entire bill. I have found this provision not only helpful but essential to the success of my efforts to hold down appropriations in the State of Minnesota.

Gov. Sam A. Baker, of Missouri, after advising that the constitution of that State has such a provision, adds:

I do not know what I would do in this State if this provision were not in the constitution, because legislatures of States (and I presume the same is true of the Nation) are very apt to overappropriate.

F. M. Johnson, secretary to the Governor of Nebraska, writes that section 15, article 4, of the Nebraska constitution authorizes the governor to disapprove of any item or items of an appropriation bill and they can not be repassed except by a three-fifths vote of the Members of both Houses.

Gov. A. Harry Moore, of New Jersey, advises that the constitution of that State has such a provision and comments as follows:

This provision has worked out satisfactorily in this State, and I think your idea in proposing such an amendment to the Constitution is a good one.

J. H. White, secretary to the Governor of Nevada, on behalf of the governor, expresses regret that the Nevada constitution does not contain such a provision, but adds:

The governor directs me to say that he is very much in accord with your idea and will be glad to see your subject adopted and made a part of the National Constitution.

Gov. Huntley N. Spaulding, of New Hampshire, while advising that the constitution of his State does not contain such a provision, comments as follows:

I believe the National Constitution and the constitution of every State should contain such a provision, and I hope for your success in the worthy endeavor which you have initiated by the introduction of House Joint Resolution No. 70.

Gov. Richard C. Dillon, of New Mexico, advises that the constitution of that State contains such a provision, and adds:

I consider this a very safe and wise provision.

J. H. Wilson, director of the budget of the State of New York, by direction of Governor Smith, writes as follows:

Under our system in the State at the present time the governor has the right to veto items from the appropriation bill, but beginning with the constitutional budget next fall, after hearings by the governor, he shall transmit to the legislature a recommended bill and the legislature then shall have the power to decrease or omit any item therein, but if they should desire to increase an item, or add an item, it must be on a separate and distinct line. The bill, when passed by both houses, shall then become a law without the governor's signature, but the added or increased items must be presented to the governor for his approval or veto.

This, in effect, accomplishes the same result as the proposed amendment which I have introduced. In other words, if the budget is added to, the Governor of New York is permitted to veto the new or increased item. This is similar to the Maryland law.

Gov. Angus W. McLean, of North Carolina, replies as follows:

First. That North Carolina is the only State in the Union in which the governor has no veto power whatever.

Second. I heartily favor the purposes of your resolutions proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to permit the President to disapprove any item of appropriation in any bill passed by Congress, without the necessity of vetoing the entire bill.

I want to emphasize and invite attention to the first paragraph of Governor McLean's letter, because I do not believe it is generally known that there is a State in the Union in which the governor does not have the veto power.

Gov. A. V. Donahey, of Ohio, advises:

Under the constitution of Ohio the governor has the power to veto separate, specific items in appropriation bills. We find it very satisfactory. The power is used frequently. I would recommend the further executive power to reduce by veto any particular items. In Ohio the governor can only veto in toto or permit an item to stand in toto.

Gov. Henry S. Johnston, of Oklahoma, writes:

I am greatly pleased with your resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States authorizing the President of the United States to veto separate items of an appropriation bill.

While Governor Johnston does not so state, Oklahoma has such a provision in its constitution similar to the amendment I have introduced.

Gov. I. L. Patterson, of Oregon, states that the constitution of Oregon gives the governor authority to veto single items in an appropriation bill.

The secretary to Gov. W. J. Bulow, of South Dakota, writes me that the constitution of his State has such a provision.

Gov. Henry H. Horton, of Tennessee, writes that his State has no such provision in its constitution, but adds:

It occurs to me that the amendment proposed would be wise.

Gov. Dan Moody, of Texas, writes:

The constitution of this State permits the governor to veto separate items of the appropriation bill. This has been the law in Texas for many years, and so far as I know there has never been any doubt of its wisdom.

Gov. George H. Dern, of Utah, writes that the constitution of his State has such a provision, and in his comment states:

The power given to the governor has seldom, if ever, been exercised in this State. I think, however, it is a proper provision, and it seems to me it would be just as appropriate in the National Government as in a State government.

He calls attention to the budget law in Utah, but in that State, as in the Federal Government, there is no way of confining appropriations to the amount recommended except by veto of specific items, as is proposed in this amendment.

Gov. Henry Flood Byrd, of Virginia, advises that his State has such an item in its constitution, and states further:

I beg to state that in Virginia the Governor has the right to veto separate items in the appropriation bill. I regard this as important and essential, and it has worked splendidly in Virginia.

Gov. John E. Weeks, of Vermont, writes that the constitution of that State does not contain such a provision.

Gov. Roland P. Hartley, of the State of Washington, calls attention to section 12 of Article III of the constitution of that State, empowering the governor to veto one or more sections or items while approving other portions of the bill, and with reference to it states:

It is my opinion that every bill should be drawn so that separate items can be vetoed. I feel it works out best that way, and agree with you that every item should justify itself.

Gov. Howard M. Gore, of West Virginia, calls attention to the fact that that State has a budget commission and that the legislature can not increase an item, but may reduce. After commenting on the matter he states:

After all, the executive is usually held responsible for the expenditures during his tour of duty, and certainly, either in the first instance—that is, in making up the budget—or in vetoing special items, is an authority that he should have.

Gov. Fred R. Zimmerman, of Wisconsin, strongly favors such an amendment and invites attention to the fact that the veto of separate items could have been used with advantage in his State if the governor had the authority to exercise that veto.

Replies were received, either from the governors or their secretaries of 37 of the 48 States. Practically all of them are in agreement that such an amendment should be adopted and that it would be in the interest of economy. In a few of the older States the constitutions do not have such a provision. Some three or four of the States have budget laws where the estimates can not be increased by the legislatures.

In addition to the above States from which replies were received from the governors or their secretaries, permit me to call attention to the fact that the constitutions of the following States have such a provision.

Section 126, Article V, of the Alabama constitution contains such a provision authorizing the governor to veto separate items of an appropriation bill.

Section 17, Article VI, of the Arkansas State constitution empowers the governor to disapprove any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money embracing distinct items.

Section 18, Article III, of the constitution of Delaware empowers the governor to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money embracing distinct items.

Section 20, Article III, of the North Dakota constitution gives the governor the power to disapprove of any item or items, or part or parts of any bill, making appropriations of money.

Section 23, Article IV, of the constitution of South Carolina empowers the governor to veto separate items of an appropriation bill.

The constitution of Wyoming has such a provision in section 9, Article IV.

For ready reference I am including as a part of my remarks the report of Mr. Raymond E. Manning, of the legislative reference service, Library of Congress, referring to and listing the sections and articles of the various State constitutions authorizing the governors of the States to veto separate items of appropriation bills. The report is as follows:

No provision in the following States: Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Vermont, Wisconsin.

RAYMOND E. MANNING.

DECEMBER 5, 1927.

It may be asked, What are the objections urged against this proposed amendment? I have heard of none, either in the discussion before the Judiciary Committee, on the floor of the House, or from the governors of the several States. The only objection I have ever heard is the reluctance to amend the Constitution of the United States. Of course, I do not believe that to be a valid objection. The original Constitution would not have been adopted if it had not contained a provision for its amendment. I think that is generally conceded. It was understood that the first 10 amendments would be proposed to the Constitution by the first Congress and they were proposed on the 25th day of September, 1789. As above stated, without the promise of ratification of these amendments the original Constitution would not have been adopted.

There may be some differences of opinion as to the advisability of the adoption of some of the amendments, but I want to invite your attention to the sixteenth amendment providing for the collection of income taxes. I think no considerable number of people have raised any objection to that amendment or suggested that it should not have been adopted. Washington, in his farewell address, invites attention to the provision for the amendment of the Constitution in the orderly way. The truth is that every amendment proposed to the Constitution should be most carefully considered and should be considered on its own merits.

I am not one of those who believe that the Constitution should be lightly amended, but I voted a few days ago to amend the Constitution by changing the beginning of the terms of the President and Vice President and Members of Congress, because I thought it was a wholesome amendment.

I believe that this proposed amendment is a meritorious one and one that is in the interest of economy and it should be considered on its own merits.

I submit it, therefore, to the thoughtful consideration of the Congress.

I am appending hereto the replies of the governors of the several States in addition to the excerpts which I have above noted. Some of these replies contain additional argument in support of the adoption of the proposed amendment:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, STATEHOUSE,
Phoenix, Ariz., December 22, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN HASTINGS: I have your letter with inclosed joint resolution amending the Constitution of the United States so that the President may veto any single item of the appropriation bill.

I certainly would approve of that, and it should have the vote of our Arizona delegation. That provision is in our constitution, which is acknowledged to be the most modern in the United States—with all apologies to the State of Oklahoma, of which State you are a distinguished Representative.

Trusting you will be successful in your efforts, believe me,
Yours very truly,

GEO. W. P. HUNT, Governor.

GOVERNOR'S OFFICE, STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, December 22, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: In answer to your letter of December 17 I would say that our California constitution does permit a governor to either veto or reduce an amount of separate items in any appropriation bill.

In my judgment this has worked very well, and everyone is satisfied with it. The only objection which I have heard regarding it is the provision for reducing the amount of an appropriation. As regards this provision, some claim that a governor might be able to practically kill a governmental function which he did not care openly to oppose by reducing the legislative appropriation to such an extent that it would practically throttle its activities.

As to whether this would work similarly in Congress, I should not care to express an opinion. Those of you who are intimately connected with the work of the National Legislature are able to judge this more accurately than a State official could do.

Yours very sincerely,

C. C. YOUNG, Governor.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, THE STATE OF COLORADO,
Denver, December 20, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
United States Congressman, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Replying to your communication of December 17, to Governor Adams, in reference to House Joint Resolution 70, will say that the constitution of Colorado under the supreme court decisions has made it impossible for the governor to veto separate items of an appropriation where they are linked up with other items. This, on several occasions, has placed the State in a very embarrassing position, and the actions of the last legislature caused a very acute condition to arise at the present time.

The legislature overappropriated about $1,300,000 on straight maintenance appropriations, which compelled the governor to sign all of these bills rather than to leave State institutions without any funds.

If it had been possible for the governor to veto separate items he could have eliminated several unnecessary amounts from nearly every department of the State, and in this way could have brought the appropriation within the estimated revenues of the State. As it is, the State appears to be in a seemingly financial-embarrassed condition, and some of the State institutions falling in the lower classes are without funds, due to their classification, while other institutions in the State, due also to their classification and overappropriation, are receiving more funds than necessary for their operation. All of these embarrassments could have been avoided had the governor been able to veto certain items which were linked up in the regular maintenance bills.

Due to our personal experience, we believe that Federal legislation of this nature is absolutely necessary for the proper administration of the National Government.

Respectfully,

B. T. POXSON,
Secretary to the Governor.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, EXECUTIVE CHAMBERS,
Hartford, December 27, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Room 361, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of December 21 inclosing copy of House Joint Resolution 70, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution.

Prior to my first session as governor the same situation existed in Connecticut that now exists nationally, namely, the governor was compelled to accept the budget bill as a whole or veto it in toto. This situation was remedied by an amendment to the State constitution, adopted November, 1924, copy of which is inclosed for your information.

I am heartily in accord with your bill allowing the President to veto certain items in the Budget bill.

Very truly yours,

JOHN H. TRUMBULL.

[Inclosure]

Article XXXVI. Amendment to the constitution of Connecticut (adopted November, 1924)

The governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money embracing distinct items while at the same time approving the remainder of the bill, and the part or parts of the bill so approved shall become effective and the item or items of appropriation so disapproved shall not take effect unless the same are separately reconsidered and repassed in accordance with the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto. In all cases in which the governor shall exercise the right of disapproval hereby conferred, he shall append to the bill at the time of signing it a statement of the item or items disapproved, together with his reasons for such disapproval, and transmit the bill and such appended statement to the secretary. If the general assembly be then in session, he shall forthwith cause a copy of such statement to be delivered to the house in which the bill originated for reconsideration of the disapproved items in conformity with the rules prescribed for legislative action in respect to bills which have received executive disapproval.

STATE OF IDAHO, OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Boise, December 28, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS, M. C.,
Room 361, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN HASTINGS: Although the Idaho law does not permit its governor to veto individual items of an appropriation, nevertheless I believe there is a great deal of merit in House Joint Resolution 70, which you introduced in the House of Representatives on December 6.

Yours very truly,

H. C. BALDRIDGE, Governor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF IOWA,
Des Moines, December 23, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR REPRESENTATIVE HASTINGS: I am in receipt of your letter, and I agree heartily with you that the law should be so amended that any objectionable feature of an appropriation bill might be vetoed and the remaining portion of the bill allowed to stand.

I regret exceedingly to advise you that our constitution does not contain this provision. To my mind, it is a movement in the right direction, and an executive certainly should have a right to veto any portion of an appropriation as distinguished from vetoing the entire bill. To my mind, it is in the interest of good government.

With the compliments of the season and kind personal regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

JOHN HAMMILL, Governor.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Springfield, December 29, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry of December 21 relative to the power of the Governor of Illinois to veto items in appropriation bills, will say that no such power existed in our constitution until 1884. Prior to that date, bills could only be vetoed as a whole. This created a situation whereby acceptable items in appropriation bills often failed to become a law by the use of the veto, and objectionable items became law by failure to use the veto in order to save the residue.

In 1884, Article V, section 16, of the constitution of 1870 was amended. Section 16, in part, reads as follows:

"Bills making appropriations of money out of the treasury shall specify the objects and purposes for which the same are made, and appropriate to them, respectively, their several amounts in distinct items and sections, and if the governor shall not approve any one or more of the items or sections contained in any bill, but shall approve the residue thereof, it shall become a law as to the residue in like manner as if he had signed it. The governor shall then return the bill, with his objections to the items or sections of the same not approved by him, to the house in which the bill shall have originated, which house shall enter the objections at large upon its journal, and proceed to reconsider so much of said bill as is not approved by the governor. The same proceedings shall be had in both houses in reconsidering the same as is hereinbefore provided in case of an entire bill returned by the governor with his objections; and if any item or section of said bill not approved by the governor shall be passed by two-thirds of the members elected to each of the two houses of the general assembly, it shall become part of said law, notwithstanding the objections of the governor."

The purpose of this amendment was to enlarge the veto power by authorizing the governor to veto items in appropriation bills. This power has been exercised on numerous occasions and apparently has met with general approval.

Very truly yours,

LEN SMALL.

STATE OF INDIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Indianapolis, January 11, 1928.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of Governor Jackson I wish to acknowledge receipt of your recent communication in which you inclose copy of proposed House Joint Resolution 70. He directs me to advise you that Indiana's constitution contains no provision authorizing the governor to veto separate items of the appropriation or budget bills.

Trusting this information will meet your requirements, I am,

Very truly yours,

P. H. WOLFARD,
Secretary to the Governor.

STATE OF GEORGIA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Atlanta, December 27, 1927.

Congressman W. W. HASTINGS,
Room 361, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: I have your letter of December 21, inclosing copy of House Joint Resolution 70, which is a proposed amendment to the Constitution in regard to the question of permitting the vetoing of any single item of the appropriation bill.

In the State of Georgia the governor can veto any single item in the appropriation bill without affecting the other appropriations in the measure; the governor can not change any item in the appropriation bill, but can veto any one item without affecting any other.

The power to veto any one or more items seems to me a wise provision, and so far as I am informed it has met with the approval of the people of Georgia.

If I can serve you further, I shall be glad to do so.

Very sincerely yours,

L. G. HARDMAN, Governor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF FLORIDA,
Tallahassee, January 7, 1928.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your valued favor of December 21, I beg to advise that section 18 of Article IV of the constitution of Florida contains the following provision:

"The governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bills making appropriations of money embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items of appropriations disapproved shall be void, unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the executive veto."

The governors of this State have frequently applied the above provision to appropriation bills passed during the closing days of the session in order to avoid calling a special session.

Inasmuch as you ask for comment upon the wisdom of an amendment to the Federal Constitution such as you have proposed, I might suggest that one outstanding objection to the operation of such a provision for the National Government, which is controlled by two parties, is that it would enable a great deal of log rolling to be pulled off by making trades for appropriations, after which the prevailing party could procure presidential veto of considerable items of the minority party while obtaining approval of the items of the majority party.

Trusting this answers your inquiry of recent date, I am,

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. MARTIN, Governor.

OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR, STATE OF KANSAS,
Topeka, December 27, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Room 361, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of the 21st relative to House Joint Resolution 70.

An amendment to the Kansas constitution adopted by the people in November, 1904, granted the governor the right in any bill containing several items of appropriation of money to object to one or more items while approving the other portions of the bill.

It occurs to me that the resolution suggested by you should be adopted by Congress.

With kindest regards, I am, yours very truly,

BEN S. PAULEN, Governor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Baton Rouge, December 29, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Member of Congress, Room 361, House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the absence of Governor Simpson I am taking the liberty of furnishing you with the information you desire in your letter of the 21st instant relative to the governor of this State having power to veto separate items in an appropriation bill.

The constitution of our State does not allow the governor to veto any separate items.

Very respectfully,

W. A. PONDER,
Secretary to the Governor.

OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR, STATE OF MAINE,
Augusta, December 29, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
361 House Office Building, Washington D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HASTINGS: Governor Brewster asks me to advise you that there is no law in Maine such as outlined in your letter to him of December 21. However, the governor firmly believes in such a proposition for both State and Nation.

Cordially yours,

CARL F. MORRISON,
Executive Secretary.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Annapolis, Md., December 22, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: I have your favor of December 21. Prior to the adoption in this State of the budget amendment, the constitution authorized the governor to veto separate items of the appropriation bill. This was always regarded as a most desirable and important provision. It is no longer necessary, however, because under our system the governor now submits his budget to the legislature and the legislature can reduce or eliminate items but can not add new items. Consequently, there is no more occasion in this State for the governor to veto separate items of the budget bill.

Sincerely yours,

ALBERT C. RITCHIE, Governor.

STATE OF MICHIGAN, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Lansing, December 28, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
361 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HASTINGS: With reference to your letter of December 21 inclosing copy of House Joint Resolution 70, it seems to me that this provision of the Constitution permitting the Executive to veto particular items in appropriation bills without vetoing the rest of the bill is a good provision. We have this provision in the constitution of this State, and it seems that it is no more subject to abuse than the other system. In other words, without it the legislature may tie the hands of the executive on the question of appropriations, whereas, if this amendment were adopted, the executive may exercise his proper functions in the vetoing of specific items without imperiling the measure in which they are included.

Sincerely yours,

FRED W. GREEN.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
St. Paul, December 30, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Member of Congress, 361 House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Answering your letter of the 17th instant, I will say that the constitution of Minnesota contains a provision which makes it possible for the governor to veto separate items of appropriation bills without vetoing the entire bill. I have found this provision not only helpful but essential to the success of my efforts to hold down appropriations in the State of Minnesota.

Using this power, I reduced the appropriations of the State legislature approximately 5 per cent in 1925 and almost 4 per cent in 1927. If I had not had this power I should have faced the alternative either of repudiating my promise to the people of the State that there should be no increase in the State tax levy or calling an extra session of the legislature, as the governors of some of the neighboring States had to do at a considerable cost to the taxpayers and much inconvenience to the members.

I believe that an executive should have the power to not only veto separate items of appropriation bills but to reduce any item. The governor does not have that power in Minnesota, but I understand that he has in some of the States of the Union.

There is no legal or constitutional requirement that a department head spend all the money that the legislature appropriates for his use. There is discretion vested in the department head as to how much of the money appropriated he will spend. The question is, whether the elective head of the government, who is responsible to the people who provide the taxes, should not, rather than his appointees, have that determination.

It may not be as essential to center in the President the power of financial control in the Federal administration as it is to center that power in the States in the governor; for the Federal Government being organized in its executive department under a Cabinet appointed by and immediately answerable to the President, is subject to instant and direct control by the Chief Executive who can curb extravagance at any time he chooses to do so.

In the States the governor can not usually do this because many of the functions of the executive department are vested in appointed boards with long overlapping terms over which the chief executive has but little control. I am not ready to state that the reform which you suggest is of sufficient importance to justify the submission of a constitutional amendment, however. I am aware of the fact that it is a big undertaking to secure the ratification of an amendment to the Federal Constitution. That question is one that the Congress should determine. All I want to say is that I consider the amendment desirable.

Yours very truly,

THEODORE CHRISTIANSON.

GOVERNOR'S OFFICE, STATE OF MISSOURI,
Jefferson City, December 23, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives,
Room 361, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS, Replying to your communication of December 21, will say that the constitution of the State of Missouri does contain a provision that the governor may veto any separate item of a bill. I do not know what I would do in the matter of holding down appropriations in this State if this provision were not in the constitution, because legislatures of States—and I presume the same is true of the Nation—are very apt to overappropriate.

Sincerely yours,

SAM A. BAKER.

STATE OF NEBRASKA, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Lincoln, January 10, 1928.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Answering your letter of December 17, addressed to Governor McMullen, in which you ask if Nebraska has a law which would empower the governor to veto separate items of an appropriation bill, I beg to advise as follows:

Section 15, article 4, of our State constitution, provides that the governor may disapprove any item or items of an appropriation contained in bills passed by the legislature, and the item or items so disapproved shall be stricken therefrom, unless repassed in the manner herein prescribed in cases of disapproval of bills, i. e., a three-fifths vote of the members of both houses.

Trusting that this gives you the information that you desire, I am,

Yours very truly,

FRANK M. JOHNSON,
Secretary to the Governor.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
January 3, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: The constitution of the State of New Jersey authorizes the governor to veto a separate item of an appropriation bill. The provision is found in paragraph 7, article 5, of the State constitution, and reads as follows:

"If any bill presented to the governor contain several items of appropriations of money, he may object to one or more of such items while approving of the other provisions of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill, at the time of signing it, a statement of the items to which he objects, and the appropriation so objected to shall not take effect. If the legislature be in session he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of such statement, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered. If, on reconsideration, one or more of such items be approved by a majority of the members elected to each house, the same shall be a part of the law, notwithstanding the objections of the governor."

This provision has worked out satisfactorily in this State, and I think your idea in proposing such an amendment to the Constitution is a good one.

Very truly yours,

A. HARRY MOORE, Governor.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, STATE OF NEVADA,
Carson City, December 22, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS, M. C.,
Room 361, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Your letter of the 17th instant, addressed to Hon. F. B. Balzar, Governor of Nevada, has been received and read.

The governor directs me to say that he is very much in accord with your idea and will be glad to see your subject adopted and made a part of the National Constitution.

He regrets that there is no provision in the Nevada constitution which would enable the governor to veto any single item of the appropriation bill, although he has heretofore urged that such idea be incorporated in our own constitution. I am

Cordially yours,

J. H. WHITE,
Secretary to the Governor.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
Concord, December 28, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your letter of December 21, I regret to say that the constitution of the State of New Hampshire does not allow the governor to veto any separate item of an appropriation bill permitting the remainder of the bill to become a law. I believe the National Constitution and the constitution of every State should contain such a provision, and I hope for your success in the worthy endeavor which you have initiated by the introduction of House Joint Resolution 70.

Yours very truly,

H. N. SPAULDING, Governor.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Santa Fe, N. Mex., January 3, 1928.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your letter of December 17, I beg to say that the constitution of the State of New Mexico provides that the governor may veto separate items in the appropriation bill. I consider this a very safe and wise provision.

For further information on this subject I beg to refer you to Senator BRONSON CUTTING, of New Mexico, in the United States Senate.

Yours very truly,

R. C. DILLON, Governor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF NEW YORK,
DIVISION OF THE BUDGET,
Albany, January 16, 1928.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Room 361, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: By direction of the governor I beg to acknowledge receipt of your communication of December 21. It would have been answered sooner but for the reason that we were at that time making the State budget, which has been completed and now goes to our legislature.

I am directing that a copy of this budget be sent to you as well as a copy of our new constitutional budget law.

Under our system in the State at the present time the governor has the right to veto items from the appropriation bill, but beginning with the constitutional budget next fall, after hearings by the governor, he shall transmit to the legislature a recommended bill, and the legislature then shall have the power to decrease or omit any item therein; but if they should desire to increase an item or add an item it must be on a separate and distinct line. The bill when passed by both houses shall then become a law without the governor's signature, but the added or increased items must be presented to the governor for his approval or veto.

I think you could get more information by reading our budget law, and after reading same I think you might even improve upon the proposed joint resolution.

Respectfully yours,

JOSEPH H. WILSON,
Director of the Budget.

GOVERNOR'S OFFICE, STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
Raleigh, December 30, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Answer to your letter of December 21 has been delayed on account of the usual accumulation of work during the Christmas holidays.

Replying to the questions propounded let me say:

First. That North Carolina is the only State in the Union in which the governor has no veto power whatever.

Second. I heartily favor the purposes of your resolution proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to permit the President to disapprove any item of appropriation in any bill passed by Congress without the necessity of vetoing the entire bill.

Wishing you many happy returns of the holiday seasons, believe me,

Faithfully yours,

A. W. MCLEAN,
Governor of North Carolina.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF OHIO,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Columbus, January 7, 1928.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Replying to your recent inquiry:

Under the constitution of Ohio the governor has the power to veto separate, specific items in appropriation bills. We find it very satisfactory. The power is used frequently. I would recommend the further executive power to reduce by veto any particular items. In Ohio the Governor can only veto in toto or permit an item to stand in toto.

Very truly yours,

VIC DONAHEY, Governor.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
Oklahoma City, January 19, 1928.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: I am greatly pleased with your resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States authorizing the President of the United States to veto separate items of an appropriation bill.

That is a splendid thing to have, but I doubt if you can awaken public interest enough to establish that kind of thing.

With best wishes, I am truly yours,

HENRY S. JOHNSTON, Governor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF OREGON,
Salem, December 24, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Room 361, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of December 17 is at hand, together with the inclosed copy of House Joint Resolution 70 proposing an amendment to the Constitution.

I am referring your letter to Mr. Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state, who will be able to supply you with a copy of the Oregon Blue Book, containing the Oregon constitution, which, in Article V, section 15A, gives the governor authority to veto single items in appropriation bills.

Very truly yours,

I. L. PATTERSON, Governor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
Pierre, December 30, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Your letter dated December 21, requesting information with reference to the governor's power to veto separate items of the appropriation bill, has been received.

Article 4, section 10, of the South Dakota constitution provides that "the governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bills making appropriations of money embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be law and the item or items disapproved shall be void, unless enacted in the following manner: If the legislature be in session he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of the item or items thereof disapproved, together with his objections thereto, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered, and each item shall then take the same course as is prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto."

I trust the above-quoted section will give you the information you desire.

Very truly yours,

WM. J. BULOW, JR.,
Secretary to the Governor.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, TENNESSEE,
Nashville, December 29, 1927.

Mr. W. W. HASTINGS,
Second District of Oklahoma,
Room 361, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Your letter of recent date, inclosing me copy of bill, House Joint Resolution 70, which is an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, was duly received.

In reply to your first question, "Whether the constitution of your State contains a similar provision, and if so, how it has worked in your State?"

Our constitution does not have such a provision.

In answer to your second question, it occurs to me that the amendment proposed would be wise.

I am, yours very truly,

HENRY H. HORTON, Governor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Austin, Tex., December 31, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Your letter of December 21 has been received.

Replying to your inquiry, the constitution of this State permits the governor to veto separate items of the appropriation bill. This has been the law in Texas for many years, and so far as I know there has never been any doubt of its wisdom.

Very truly yours,

DAN MOODY.

STATE OF UTAH, OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Salt Lake City, December 28, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: With your letter of December 17 you sent me a copy of House Joint Resolution 70, by yourself, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States permitting the President to disapprove any item or appropriation of any bill passed by Congress, and you desire to know whether the constitution of Utah contains a similar provision; and if so, how it has worked in this State.

Article VII, section 8, of the constitution of Utah is as follows:

"Every bill passed by the legislature, before it becomes a law, shall be presented to the governor; if he approve he shall sign it, and thereupon it shall become a law; but if he do not approve he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it originated, which house shall enter the objections at large upon its journal and proceed to reconsider the bill. If, after such reconsideration, it again passes both houses by a yea-and-nay vote of two-thirds of the members elected to each house it shall become a law, notwithstanding the governor's objections. If any bill be not returned within five days after it shall have been presented to him (Sunday and the day on which he received it excepted), the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the legislature by its final adjournment prevent such return, in which case it shall be filed with his objections in the office of the secretary of state within 10 days after such adjournment (Sundays excepted) or become a law. If any bill presented to the governor contain several items of appropriations of money, he may object to one or more such items while approving other portions of the bill; in such case he shall append to the bill at the time of signing it a statement of the item or items which he declines to approve, together with his reasons therefor, and such item or items shall not take effect unless passed over the governor's objections as in this section provided."

You will perceive from the foregoing that the governor has the right to veto any item in the appropriation bill, and the veto of such item acts in precisely the same way as the veto of an entire bill.

The power given to the governor has seldom, if ever, been exercised in this State. I think, however, it is a proper provision, and it seems to me it would be just as appropriate in the National Government as in a State government.

In Utah the budget is prepared by the governor's office and submitted to the legislature. The legislative committees, of course, hold hearings and make some changes as a result of their own investigations, but in a large measure the governor is held responsible for the State expenditures, and he therefore should have such a measure of control as enables him to veto any specific item.

Very respectfully,

GEO. H. DERN, Governor.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
Richmond, December 22, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Acknowledging your letter of the 21st, in which you advise me that you have introduced an amendment to the Constitution to empower the President to veto separate items in the appropriation bill, and to make inquiry as to whether Virginia has such a constitutional provision. I beg to state that in Virginia the governor has the right to veto separate items in the appropriation bill. I regard this as important and essential, and it has worked splendidly in Virginia.

Sincerely yours,

H. F. BYRD.

STATE OF VERMONT, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Montpelier, December 31, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 21st was duly received, and in reply I will say that our State constitution does not contain a provision similar to that proposed in House Joint Resolution 70.

Yours very truly,

JOHN E. WEEKS,
Governor of Vermont.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Olympia, Friday, December 23, 1927.

Congressman W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your letter of December 17, in connection with House Joint Resolution 70, proposing an amendment to the Constitution which would empower the President to veto separate items of an appropriation bill, and inquiring as to whether the executive of the State of Washington is empowered to veto separate items:

Section 12 of article 3 of the State constitution of the State of Washington provides:

* * * "If any bill presented to the governor contains several sections of items he may object to one or more sections or items while approving other portions of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill at the time of signing it a statement of the section or sections, item or items, to which he objects, and the reasons therefor, and the section or sections, item or items so objected to shall not take effect unless passed over the governor's objection, as hereinbefore provided."

It is my opinion that every bill should be drawn so that separate items can be vetoed. I feel it works out best that way, and agree with you that every item should justify itself.

With best holiday greetings,

Yours very truly, ROLAND H. HARTLEY,
Governor of Washington.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
Charleston, December 28, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of December 21. In West Virginia the budget commission, which consists of the elective State officers—that is, the governor, secretary of state, auditor, attorney general, treasurer, superintendent of schools, and commissioner of agriculture—make up the budget for State expenditures within the estimated revenue. The legislature can not increase an item, but may reduce any recommendation of the board of public works. It is my judgment that for State purposes the governor should make up the budget rather than the board of public works. I believe that is the judgment of persons best informed. After all, the executive is usually held responsible for the expenditures during his tour of duty, and certainly, either in the first instance—that is, in making up the budget, or in voting special items—is an authority that he should have. However, we must keep in mind that after a bill has been passed an executive could exercise rather an unusual arbitrary power.

I am wondering if the plan followed in this State would not be better than the one that you propose—that is, the executive making up the Budget on the general current expense of the Government and permitting Congress to exercise its judgment as to whether they will grant the expenditure recommended or modify, as in keeping with their judgment.

I shall be very glad to have you stop in and see me at any time you are in the State.

With kindest personal regards and best wishes, I am,

Sincerely,

HOWARD M. GORE, Governor.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Madison, Wis., December 24, 1927.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Your letter of December 21, with a copy of the House Joint Resolution 70, is before me.

I believe that the President and governors should have the power to veto separate items in an appropriation measure. May I give you a personal experience with the last session of the Wisconsin Legislature:

The legislature had passed a regular university appropriation bill to which a rider was added making an appropriation for the civil service commission. Of course, there was no association between the civil service commission and the university, but it was necessary for me to either sign the bill as it was, or veto it. If it had been possible for me to veto separate items I should certainly have vetoed the civil service rider.

Our Wisconsin Progressives have always condemned the National Congress for similar actions, but what I relate was accomplished by Wisconsin Progressives in the last legislature.

I am, indeed, in favor of granting the President and governors the power to veto separate items in appropriation bills.

With kind personal regards, I am yours sincerely,

FRED R. ZIMMERMAN, Governor.

THE WET BLOC IN CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAPES). The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in common with the membership generally, I followed with a great deal of interest the fine presentation of the feature of the President's veto power in connection with appropriations, which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] has given us.

I now beg your indulgence while I take up a subject much removed from that question. It is perhaps a strange anomaly, but it seems to be true, that no family is small enough to be immune from controversies and discord, and no Republic insignificant enough to be immune from revolution and political discord. That seems to hold true through the field of organizations of all sorts. We have in Congress various blocs—the farm bloc, the wet bloc, the dry bloc, and others—and of them all there is but one of these blocs, so far as I know, that has a definite, positive organization, regularly elected officials, official stationery, and so forth. Calling itself an unofficial committee of the House, the wet bloc of the House is a definite entity which for the last three or four years has been struggling desperately to organize itself and get enough Members to agree upon one definite line of action to make some impression upon the House. As far as my recollection goes, 62—one-seventh of the House—is about the limit they have ever been able to corral in harmony on one question, as evidenced by their cooperative scheme of introducing beer bills. I think 62 is the most that ever joined in one measure. Recently that bloc, that definite organization that for three or four years has been attempting to unite upon a policy, succeeded in getting a roll call of the Members of the House on an issue that they selected and presented to the House. The result of that roll call was so disastrous, as evidence of sentiment in Congress, that not only the wets in Congress but the wets throughout the country are tremendously despondent over the situation as thus demonstrated on the eve of a national election. The leadership of the bloc for the moment felt that in merely getting a roll call they had accomplished a great result, although we all know that 40 or 50 Members can usually get a roll call at any time, and that many times one Member can accomplish that result by making the point of order of no quorum. Immediately after the late disastrous vote upon the Treasury appropriation bill, with reference to the use of certain denaturants in denatured alcohol, the Baltimore Sun published a feature article on the first column of the front page, I think in their issue of February 22—at any rate it is dated February 22—in which their correspondent said:

Mutiny is afoot among the wet crew in Congress, and some are suggesting that the new captain be made to "walk the plank."

This situation has developed as a result of the defeat a few days ago when the wets followed their newly chosen leader, Representative LINTHICUM, Democrat, Maryland, into a fight with the drys over the continued use of poisons in the manufacture of industrial alcohol. Mr. LINTHICUM tried to prohibit such use.

The wets were forced to face the guns on this issue on a roll-call vote, the first record vote to be had on any wet and dry question since the passage of the Volstead Act. On the face of things there were only 61 wet votes to 283 dry, or nearly 5 to 1 against the modification of the prohibition laws by the indirect method proposed by the Marylander.

Labor, in its special correspondence at that time, said:

Evidently the wets have made little impression on Congress despite the vigorous fight they have been waging.

I think the article in the Baltimore Sun was a little more harsh with the new leader of the wet bloc than was entirely fair. The situation was one that he was not entirely responsible for in the small minority of votes that followed his leadership. He is the leader of a forlorn hope. I have here a copy of the Minute Man of March 22, 1928. It is my impression that the Minute Man has at times carried in some of its editions the statement that it is the organ of the association against the prohibition amendment in this State or that. My recollection may be at fault in that, but that is my recollection. This issue, however, carries no statement that it is the official organ of anyone. It does carry the comforting assurance which they evidently feel may be deemed necessary that "this magazine has no connection whatsoever with any liquor or other trade interests." In that issue, on page 18, is this statement.

The Minute Man, as I have been noting it for several years, has seemed to be about the most active and influential of the wet publications, and so an expression from this organ is entitled to weight as demonstrating the great lack of harmony that exists in this very small organization in the House and in the wet ranks generally. I read:

The Minute Man is and has always been of the opinion that in the law-enforcement provisions of the eighteenth amendment everything demanded in Congress should be provided without any regard to anyone's private opinions. We have never been in sympathy with the very stupid "wet" bloc in the House.

I am not vouching for this article. I am quoting it; and I want my wet friends to understand that this is the language of the article and not my language.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What statement is it?

Mr. CRAMTON. The statement of the Minute Man. I take it that it is an editorial article. It is not signed. To resume:

We have never been in sympathy with the very stupid "wet" bloc in the House. The strategy and the tactics employed from the very beginning have done more harm to the liberal cause than all the dry speeches in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Under foolish leadership it has allowed itself to be maneuvered into record votes, each one progressively more one-sided than the one preceding, resulting, of course, in the entirely just claim (based upon record votes, of course) that Congress is getting drier with each test.

This wet bloc has never been countenanced by many really prominent Members who, while equally detesting prohibition, have consistently voted with the drys. It is another case of heaven preserve us from our friends.

I think that not too much of this responsibility should be heaped upon the shoulders of my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM]. I remember the roll call in question. If I am not mistaken, it was demanded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAREW], whose relations are at least cordial with Tammany, and no doubt at least cordial with Gov. Al Smith, the probable Democratic nominee for the Presidency. [Applause.] I think it will be significant of what will follow in the Democratic campaign, that the little applause at the mention of the name of the prospective Democratic nominee was confined to two gentlemen on the front seats. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, may I have two minutes more?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman inform us what subject he is discussing?

Mr. CRAMTON. The lack of harmony between the gentleman and his friends of the wet bloc. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I will yield the floor. I will withdraw my request.

THE HIGH PRICE OF MEAT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, when the agricultural appropriation bill was before the House I took occasion then, as I have done at other times, to complain about the high and exorbitant price of meat, the retail price, in cities. Every time I make a statement on the high cost of meat I receive a lengthy letter from the Institute of American Meat Packers. This is the Washington office of the meat packers. They always close their communication with the request that I insert their letter in the RECORD. I shall put their latest letter in the RECORD. They feel that my figures are incorrect. I feel that their figures are incorrect. I will leave it to the millions of housewives in the country to decide who is right. Taking their own figures, I fail to see how they can justify the exorbitant high retail prices of meats in the city. I mean the actual prices people are paying for meat.

What they do is this: They assume an ideal state of facts for themselves, and on that assumed state of facts they argue their case. They talk about cheap grades of meat that are not at all available.

Now, after receiving this letter from the representatives of the meat packers in Washington I had a survey made in the city of New York, in the four of the five counties of the greater city, New York County—that is, Manhattan—the Bronx, Kings County—that is, Brooklyn—and Queens County, and I find that the average cost of porterhouse steak was 65 cents a pound. The average cost of sirloin steak was 55 cents a pound; and I found that this meat that they talk about—plate beef, at 23 cents—is theoretical, and you can not eat theoretical meat. What few scraps some butcher will put on the block at the lowest price I could find was offered at about 25 cents a pound, and it was of such an inferior quality that it was of absolutely no use to the average consumer.

Now, last week there was a shortage of lambs in the city of Washington. There was a shortage of lambs in New York City. I believe lamb was purposely held back in order to shoot up prices. After receiving the letter from the American Institute of Meat Packers, I communicated with Mr. Draper and asked him about the price of lamb. He told me then that the wholesale price of lamb to the retailer was about 27 cents a pound. I have here in my hand a slip from the Cudahy Packing Co. showing that on April 2 the wholesale price of lamb was 32 cents a pound and that was not choice lamb. The lamb covered by this invoice was a year old. The spring lamb, the choice lamb, is wholesaling at 33 and 34 cents a pound in New York and Washington. That is the whole carcass, the whole animal. So that you can not get lamb chops at anything under 60 cents, and roasting leg of lamb averaged about 45 cents a pound in New York City on last Saturday. Calf's liver is up to 90 cents a pound in New York City. Calf's liver in Washington was about 80 cents a pound. Now, no one can assert there is any justification for such prices.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. Lamb producers are contracting this next year's crop at 10 and 10½ cents a pound live weight, so that there must be a great spread between the producer and the consumer.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. The gentleman is absolutely right. To make sure, after I received these letters I had these surveys made in the four counties of New York City by friends who are cooperating with me in an effort to bring about a readjustment of prices of meat in our city.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then I took the wholesale prices of lamb right in the city, because I was discussing those prices with Mr. Draper, of the Institute of American Meat Packers, and the retailers in Washington told me that what is known as the choice lamb, the lamb we are supposed to eat around Easter time, will average and does average to-day about 33 to 34 cents a pound wholesale, that the price of the roast lamb will be from 40 cents to 45 cents a pound and chops from 60 cents to 65 cents a pound.

I believe it is a wholesome thing that these retail prices should be made known and that we should discuss them, because, as the gentleman from Utah suggests, this stretch between what the livestock men are getting and what we in the cities are paying is too big, out of all proportion, and there is something wrong somewhere.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SEGER. Does not the gentleman believe that the shortage of lamb in the District is due to the great demand for lambs in Wall Street at this time?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. They have been shorn, have they not?

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert this letter from the Institute of American Meat Packers.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

INSTITUTE OF AMERICAN MEAT PACKERS,
WASHINGTON OFFICE, MUNSEY BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., March 29, 1928.

Hon. F. H. LAGUARDIA,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our attention has been directed to remarks which you made March 3 in the House of Representatives on beef prices. In view of your interest in the subject, may we comment on several of the topics which you discussed on that occasion?

In the first place, you mention 75 cents a pound as being the price of beefsteak. The steer, of course, is not all steak, and a price of 75 cents a pound for steak by no means represents the average retail price of beef.

It may be possible that some retail dealers have been charging that much for some cuts—porterhouse and sirloin steaks—but we feel certain that you will find that there are many cuts of beef selling at far lower figures and that many retailers are selling steak at prices well below 75 cents a pound.

Although packers sell at wholesale, we believe it only fair to the retailer to state the facts.

The most recent retail meat price quotations for New York City, those issued by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics for December 6, 1927, show the following retail beef prices:

	Cents per pound.
Sirloin steak	56.6
Round steak	47.1
Rib roast	43.0
Chuck roast	29.5
Plate beef	23.6

These prices, as you note, are well below 75 cents a pound. Moreover, the five beef items listed here do not include a number of cuts which sell at even lower levels. The retail meat dealer is obliged to sell several of the cuts at or below the actual wholesale cost of the steer in order to move them at all, and as a result it is necessary for him to charge higher prices for several of the cuts which are more in demand.

Although you referred in your talk to current retail meat prices in New York City, we believe that these prices are quite representative of the prices prevailing at the time your talk was made, inasmuch as beef-cattle prices and wholesale beef prices on December 15 were slightly higher than they were around the 1st of March.

In comparing these retail prices with wholesale prices, or with the cost of live cattle, it must be borne in mind that beef cattle are not all meat. The dressing percentage in the packing plant averages about 54 per cent. The remaining 46 per cent includes the by-products, which are sold, in most cases, at low prices, and also includes the shrinkage and portions from which no revenue is obtained. Moreover, when the retailer buys a side of beef weighing 367 pounds, which is an average weight, he receives 75 to 80 pounds of bones, suet, etc., part of which he must trim from the meat he sells and for which he can get less than cost.

These official figures which we have quoted indicate clearly, in our opinion, that 75 cents a pound is far above the average retail price of good beef.

Beef prices are somewhat higher now than they have been in the past, but as Secretary Jardine has pointed out in an official statement issued recently: "The present beef prices * * * seem unduly high only because they are compared with prices of the last few years, which were ruinously low to the cattle grower."

At another point in your talk you urge cattle raisers to establish a more direct contact with consumers, and then say, "The producer is not going to get a fair price, and the consumer will have to pay an exorbitant price."

We should like to call your attention to reliable figures which indicate clearly that the cost of distributing meat and the profits of the packing industry are relatively small, and that the producer receives a relatively large share of the consumer's meat dollar. At the National Distribution Conference, held in Washington in December, 1926, under the auspices of the United States Chamber of Commerce, it was shown that the slaughtering and meat-packing industry had a lower cost of distribution than any of the other essential industries studied. You undoubtedly are familiar with this information which appears in the report of Committee IV of the National Distribution Conference, a volume entitled "Expenses of Doing Business."

Furthermore, the most recent figures issued by the United States Bureau of the Census, those for 1925, showed that the meat-packing industry pays out for raw materials, principally livestock, 85 per cent of the plant value of its product; the other 15 per cent goes to pay all operating expenses, including such items as interest, depreciation, overhead, rent, taxes, and a small manufacturing profit.

It should be borne in mind, however, that out of the money which he receives from the packer for the sale of his livestock the producer must pay the expenses of raising, feeding, and transporting the animals.

Furthermore, figures compiled and issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, following an extensive survey, show that retail meat dealers make an average profit of less than 3 per cent on sales.

In our opinion, these figures indicate clearly that the packing industry is serving the livestock producer economically and efficiently, and that the prices which the consumer pays for meat are entirely fair.

You also state in this talk that meat in New York City is a luxury. We should like to point out that, while the prices of some beef cuts may be relatively high, other beef cuts are selling at considerably lower prices, as the figures just quoted indicate. Furthermore, practically all cuts of pork are wholesaling and retailing at levels which are from 15 to 40 per cent lower than a year ago. Measured by its food value and healthful properties, meat is one of our most essential and valuable foods and is in no sense a luxury.

We venture the hope that you will bring these facts to the attention of your colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Very truly yours,

INSTITUTE OF AMERICAN MEAT PACKERS,
NORMAN DRAPER, Washington Representative.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. SUMMERS of Washington (at the request of Mr. HADLEY), for four days, on account of necessary absence from the city.

To Mr. TILLMAN, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in family.

Mr. Mr. MCKEOWN, for five days, on account of illness in family.

THE AIRPLANE, THE RADIO, AND THE POSSIBILITIES OF THE FUTURE

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, a week ago many Members of Congress, through the courtesy and generosity of Colonel Lindbergh, had the pleasure of seeing Washington from the perspective of the sky. To one who was so fortunate as to enjoy that pleasure and honor, the romance of the conquest of the air holds a great appeal.

If you will forgive a personal reference, I recall a most dramatic story told to me by my father, Rev. Joseph Guyer, when I returned for the holiday vacation in the fall of 1895 from the University of Kansas, where I was pursuing my legal studies. In October an old friend had visited him in central Kansas. They were boyhood and manhood friends, preached in the same church for over a quarter of a century, and were born in the same year—1828—just a century ago. I remember how my father laughed at Bishop Milton Wright because he said that his boys were going to perfect a flying machine that would fly; how the venerable bishop had described that old biplane; how the boys had built a slide on the side of a sand dune; how one of them would lie down on the lower part of the plane while the other pushed him off; and that when he reached the bottom of the slide he had gained sufficient momentum to keep the air, twenty-five, fifty, and sometimes a hundred feet. And then, with all the audacity and finality of one who has demonstrated a proposition in geometry, Milton Wright exclaimed:

When Wilbur and Orville find an agent to drive that machine, they'll fly like birds!

That was where my father laughed. The whole world laughed. Flying had been the jest of the ages ever since Icarus blossomed out in Greek mythology. The highest expression of impossibility was: "You might just as well try to fly," an expression so deeply rooted that it still persists in our language.

You might just as well have told my father that they would invent a delicate little instrument that would reach out its invisible arm across the continents and from the voiceless silence of the air steal the music of a thousand orchestras and fling it back across the hemispheres to ravish the ear of the earth in palace and cottage and hovel as to tell him that men would fly. You might as well have told him that this marvelous little instrument would stretch out its magic wand and gather up the words of a hundred orators a thousand miles away to charm the people with their eloquence as to tell him that men would fly. You might as well have told him that there was at that moment a boy over at Amherst College 23 years of age who, on the 4th of March, in 1925, would stand out yonder on that historic old portico and whisper his message to every nook and corner of this mighty land of ours as to tell him that men would fly.

I wonder what my father would have thought if, in a moment of prophetic vision, Milton Wright would have told him that, before a third of a century had fallen into the abyss of the past, a boy five and twenty years of age would in 33 hours wrap about his youthful brow the chaplet of immortal fame by conquering the old Atlantic and cheating its hungry billows, and land safely in the field of Le Bourget in Paris.

Mr. Speaker, what are we going to do next? They tell me, sir, that they are going to dig down into the dusty archives of dead and forgotten centuries and reproduce the voices of those whose tongues have been sealed by the silence of death for thousands of years. They tell me that they will reproduce the golden voice of him who hurled his thunderbolts at Phillip of Macedon. That they will reproduce the voice of Him who walked by the side of the tideless sea of Galilee, of Him who whispered to all the world:

Suffer little children to come unto me.

That they will tune in on the 18th of June in 1815 and, amid the thunder of Waterloo, they will hear the conqueror of Napoleon pray, as he looked at his watch: "Oh! for night or Blücher." And maybe we will find out if he said it, for no Englishman ever admitted that he said anything of the kind. That they will pick up the 19th of November in 1863, and over yonder, on the soil of old Gettysburg, made sacred by the blood of our fathers, will hear a heart-broken voice begin:

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Impossible! you say. Of course it is impossible. That was precisely what my father told Milton Wright in October, 1895, about the airplane. There is nothing impossible if the intellect of man centers upon it and thinks and dreams about it long enough.

For a thousand years before our fathers founded this blessed country of ours the great minds of the earth were centered upon one colossal question—"What are the rights of man?" How far can arbitrary power trample upon the rights of the individual? How far can the individual disregard the rights of society? Then, one day, a tall, tawny-haired son of old Virginia sat down at a colonial table and in four hours wrote all the conclusions of a thousand years of thinking into the Declaration of Independence, and that question was forever settled.

I repeat it, there is nothing impossible. If you have any respect for your reputation as a prophet, erase that word "impossible" from your vocabulary. There is nothing impossible for America as long as she is filled with youth that looks straight into the sun, that gazes across the far and radiant stretches of the sky, clear-eyed, clean-lived, lion-hearted, like that unconquerable Viking of the air, like that incomparable eaglet, unafraid.

THE DRY BLOC

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I was very much impressed with the address of the last speaker, especially toward its conclusion when he referred to governments trampling on the rights of men, and his friendly reference to the great Democrat, Jefferson. I would that we had another Jefferson so that we could have another declaration of independence which is sadly needed in this country, as emphasized by the speech of a preceding speaker, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CRAMTON].

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], makes the point that the wet bloc is divided in itself. Well, of course, it is divided. It is an independent, liberal, intelligent, thinking bloc, and necessarily has divisions. The dry bloc, on the other hand, represents just a dry chain gang under the whip of an outside organization called the Anti-Saloon League. But there are divisions among the drys too—not making any reference to the drys in this House. They are divided in this way. First of all, and the main division, are those who get it and those who do not get it. Then there is another division, the drys with a Bible and a flask in the back pocket and the drys with two flasks in the back pocket.

Speaking of roll calls, give us a roll call on the main question. You have packed committees in this House against the people of this country having a roll call on the question. Give us a roll call on straight modification and you will see the drys blow up and scatter to the four winds on such a roll call.

The gentleman spoke of the farm bloc. The farm bloc itself has surrendered to the dry bloc and the Anti-Saloon League in this House. I defy the farm bloc of the Congress to go back to the farmers and tell them what they have lost in barley and hops since prohibition. Show them the figures that come from official sources and see how long they will last.

I do not blame the gentleman from Michigan from glorifying in the result of the roll call. He is an extremist. The gentleman from Michigan is the presiding elder of the Borgia bloc in the House. Naturally, they glorify in the fact they can continue poisoning the American people. Let the men who voted on that question go back to their constituents and say they voted to spend the public money on poisoning the American people in the interest of enforcement of prohibition.

I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAREW] when he demanded a roll call did a very noteworthy thing in the progress of this proposition. He got a record of this House on the extremists among the drys. Some men will have to go back to their constituents and say to their constituents, "At a roll call on whether or not the Government should be allowed to poison the great, free American people, I, an American Congressman, cringing to the Anti-Saloon League, losing my self-respect, forgetting that I owed it to the people to be with them, voted to permit the Prohibition Bureau to send out poison through the friends of prohibition, the bootleggers, to the American people."

We never had bootleggers before we had prohibition. Bear that in mind, gentlemen of the Borgia bloc.

Passed the senate March 12, 1928.

Passed the house of representatives March 22, 1928.

I, Walker Wood, secretary of state of the State of Mississippi, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution 15, Legislature of the State of Mississippi of 1928, as shown by the enrolled act thereof on file in my said office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Mississippi this the 3d day of April, 1928.

[SEAL.] WALKER WOOD,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Federation of Citizens Associations of the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas numerous hearings and public discussions of the proposal to relocate the farmers' produce market clearly indicate that from 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the produce sold thereon will probably pass through wholesalers or jobbers and perhaps cold-storage warehouses; and

Whereas such an indirect method of distribution will result in increased commodity prices and thus tend to deny consumers of any financial benefit of enough consequence to warrant the cost of such a market being borne by the funds of the District of Columbia: Be it

Resolved by the Federation of Citizens Associations this 31st day of March, 1928, as follows:

1. That public funds raised by the taxpayers of the District of Columbia ought not be used to provide any kind of market that is to be largely of a wholesale character.

2. That provision might be made for a new and suitable retail market in a central location, with ample facilities for the sale by farmers of their produce, this new center market to be either a municipal activity or a private activity under proper public supervision.

3. And, further, the federation recommends that the present Center Market be retained as long as possible without interference with the Federal building program.

4. That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the Speaker House of Representatives and the President United States Senate with the request that they be formally presented to the Congress and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

5. That copies also be forwarded to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the citizens' advisory council, the Bureau of the Budget, and the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WAGNER presented resolutions adopted by the International Unemployed Conference, at Washington, D. C., which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the International Unemployed Conference, Washington, D. C., April 3, 1928

Whereas we have so much alleged prosperity on the one hand; and

Whereas we have so much destitution and unemployment on the other; and

Whereas we have both the ability and inclination to work if but given the opportunity; and

Whereas millions of people have no permanent address because they have not permanent jobs and, being necessarily migrants, have lost their ballot: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the Government extend its unemployment activities and further establish free Federal employment bureaus in all cities, thus to displace private, fee-charging employment agencies; and be it further

Resolved, That we call upon Congress further to make provisions for public works at the regular union scale of wages; and be it further

Resolved, That the Government establish a standard six-hour working day for all workers in order to keep pace with overproduction that is the result of application of modern machinery and business methods in industry; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress pass a national old-age pension and unemployment insurance bill; and be it further

Resolved, That the income tax law be allowed to remain as at present in force, and that the surplus created therefrom be used to establish a national old-age pension and unemployment insurance fund; and be it further

Resolved, That the present immigration law and quota restriction acts remain the same as now, rather than be made more drastic; and be it finally

Resolved, That we petition Congress to the end that all American citizens who may be migrants through lack of employment be accorded full balloting rights.

Mr. CURTIS presented six petitions numerously signed by citizens of Topeka, Parsons, Augusta, Mound Valley, and Linn County, and sundry other citizens, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

FARM-LOAN AND BANKING SYSTEMS

Mr. BLEASE. I ask to have printed in the RECORD articles on the farm-loan system and the banking system.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from Farmers' National Magazine]

HOW POLITICIANS HAVE RUINED FEDERAL FARM-LOAN SYSTEM'S POSSIBLE ASSISTANCE TO THE AMERICAN FARMER

One of the modern crimes is the ruination of the Federal farm-loan system, due to the withering hand of politics being permitted to touch it, under the guise of an amendment to the fundamental farm loan act of 1916, whereby the great system was placed under the direct control of outside politicians, who have not 1 cent involved in its capitalization, but who so completely dominate its operation as to preclude assistance to the farmers who depend upon it for financial assistance in carrying on their business, as intended when this act was first passed by Congress.

While many politicians have raised the hue and cry that dangerous Russian propagandists were intruding into the affairs of the United States, particularly as related to our relations with Mexico, an even worse lot of free thinkers have captured the great Federal farm-loan system and are to-day engaged in a pillage which would make ancient Rome's downfall look like a Sunday afternoon picnic.

We have long-haired Ikeovitch and his family of little Ikes in complete control of the Federal farm-loan system. But do not forget that Ike is a very wonderful fellow. He has a remarkable record back of him. He faces an even more thrilling experience, but the fact that the United States Government and the thousands of farmers who now "hold the bag," assuming the 10 per cent liability which makes the farm-loan system substantial, does not worry Ike a little. Like his former political appointees, he will vanish into the vapor of the "lame-duck" class the moment things become too hot and will have the most complete alibi, just as similar types have in the past.

Ikeovitch has endeavored to cure many human ills—using public and private funds contrary to the Constitution and in direct violation of property rights. But his latest scheme is one of the finest, widest, and wildest that he has evolved and put into effect. It provides him and his appointees with a gigantic superpolitical machine to dominate the alleged cooperative presently farm-owned Federal land-bank system. The farmers who secured loans through the 12 land banks have now completely paid off their stock subscriptions, advanced by the United States Treasury, and they, the farmers, assume all the liabilities necessary to make this a strong, going American-banking system. But it is Ike and his tribe that completely dominate the system! Isn't this a cute way of "doing the farmer" a favor?

Ike, as you may recall, does not limit his activities to mere geographical dimensions. Oh, no. America is now witnessing one of his great achievements in the steal of the farmer's loan system, but Ike is quite cosmopolitan as a character, a citizen of the world, we might add, and has recently spent a large part of his vacation over in Russia, seeking out ideals to implant in the Federal farm-loan system. He is charmed with the farmer's banking system as carried on by the Russians, and he has, thanks to the shortsighted action of Congress, been able to adopt this same system on a nation-wide scale in the United States. He has taken over the farmer's banks! No; not in Russia—right here in the United States, "the land of the free and the home of the brave." Thus we have seen a modern miracle, Republican appointees turned into real, honest-to-gosh bolshevist politicians, right before your eyes.

We ought not to mention the fact, but it is interesting to note. The folks over in Russia harkened unto Ikeovitch and placed their successful cooperative rural banks, which had been privately owned and operated under the control of the terrible czar, and later under red Lenine and redder Trotsky, in the hands of Ike's crowd. Ike made almost as great a success as a banker in Russia as he is about to become in the United States. After he and his followers had had a few months' time to work out their blessings, money in Russia became about one thousand times less valuable than before Ike started out, and even the farmers, the political-dominated banks Ike operated, had no faith in them. Later nobody had faith in the financial system, so this is the reason Ike's crowd moved over to the United States and took over the Federal farm-loan system. And they are now having one heck of a time trying to make it go.

But Ike can not be discouraged. He is really jubilant with the progress he has made in this country. He packed the Banking and Currency Committee rooms of the House and the Senate with his appointees—the "job snatchers" who received their pittance from his political system, and they all testified that it would be most unsafe and surely unsound to let the farmers who owned the 12 Federal land banks operate them; it would not even be considered quite right that the farmers who owned these banks to have even a majority of the directors on the board. And, would you believe it, contrary as this system is to every principle of American rights, the Congress had the audacity to adopt the amendment as Ike's crowd wrote it, and they actually took the 12 Federal land banks away from the farmers who owned them, putting in the stead of the farmers men possessed of more political "pull" than sound judgment or experience in either agriculture or banking!

This national robbery stands alone in annals of the history of congressional action, but the worst of it all was that Washington propagandists had the audacity to then proclaim to a waiting world that they had enacted farm legislation which would be helpful to farming interests. This, after they had actually robbed the farmers of millions of bank stocks, turned this vast sum over to politicians to manipulate but left the farmer still holding the bag of liability. In justice, when Congress turned these banks over to the politicians, they should have made provision for the same politicians, not the robbed farmers, to have assumed the liability. But no, they were "helping" the farmers.

The fact is, as every sane man well knows, politically controlled banks have nowhere on the face of this earth resulted otherwise than in deplorable failure. Yet, in the face of this demonstrated fact, we witness an American Congress going into just that sort of business on a gigantic, nation-wide scale, leaving the rightful, legal owners—the farmer stockholders—with the privilege of paying the poor debts instituted by politicians.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END

Under political control banks first lose the faith of patrons and borrowers, and later the bond buyers. The latter has now taken place, though farmers lost faith in the system long ago, when Congress made those first mismoves of turning the system over to political domination.

Sound banking means that he who owns the bank's stock and assumes the bank's liability enjoys managing power over the institution. This theory is not confined to any special spot on the earth; it is recognized as essential to sound economy everywhere. We must realize, therefore, that those, in and out of Congress, who adopt the directly opposite view, are as thoroughly unfamiliar with sane banking and sound finance as they are in justice to property owners.

This superpolitical system of land banks has set up a supreme board in Washington to run the farmer's business for him. It is given power of selection, appointment, and domination of all officials, naming more politicians to help other politicians to operate a banking system owned by farmers. In each of the land banks—12 in all—throughout the United States, this same political board had placed a majority of the directors (at fancy prices); but they were very kind and considerate, for they permitted a minority of men elected (?) by the farmer owners to come down to the land bank now and then and watch the politicians operate the bank.

But they let the farmer owners pay all the bills! Isn't that kind? It is without parallel in American business. The farmer owner of the Federal land bank, who owns all the stock and assumes all the liability, is thus made a helpless outsider—a goat and a monkey!

POLITICS AND OIL DON'T MIX

The recent startling revelations of the Republican administration's operations in the now infamous Teapot Dome Oil Co., demonstrated only too well that "politics and oil don't mix." And we can not mix politics and politicians with private business enterprise, whether we hope to operate a peanut stand or a farmers' land-banking system. Political control of private enterprises has ever resulted in sad and expensive disasters. The reasons are plain, as every sane-minded American well knows.

Political control squeezes out individual initiative and opportunity, individual rewards and punishments; nobody has a free hand, no one is directly responsible. Political control decides economic questions politically, which can only be done at enormous cost.

North Dakota demonstrated the results accruing from political control and manipulation of private enterprises. No one to this day doubts the entire integrity of the North Dakota farmer to make good any promise that he may make; no one fails to recognize the great and varied natural resources of that State, but for a time North Dakota, under politically controlled banking systems, could not sell North Dakota bonds to investors in sufficient quantities to carry on North Dakota business. It was because North Dakota for a time persisted in doing business entirely contrary to sane banking rules. People in and out of the State lost confidence in those charged with the operation of the political banks. That moment the usefulness of those banks terminated.

SUPERPOLITICAL BANKING SYSTEM

And, strange to relate, with the lesson, sad as it was, that North Dakota fully demonstrated for the loose thinkers of this country, in face of this record, the American Congress set about putting into effect a similar, only more gigantic political banking system, a great superorganization in charge of farmer-owned banks operating in 48 States and Territories beyond the sea, and took out of the hands of the more than 4,000 cooperative national farm loan associations, whose members owned the stock in those banks, all vestage of American property rights, or the simple operation of that which the farmers had digged into their pockets and paid for!

It is not strange that investment capital in recent days is turning away from the purchase of Federal land-bank bonds and is seeking premiums elsewhere. Investment always turns its back on political affairs. Experience goes to show that successful banking therefore lies in the opposite direction, depending for security upon the active management of the institution by the owners—not by outside "changing" politicians.

What scant latitude political control leaves for efficient administration is patent to even the average citizen. We know from bitter experience the many ill effects of such control on business in general, and upon every business in particular that has ever come under its domination. The same adverse causes that have affected other business enterprises that have come in contact with political domination is now also working havoc, disappointment, and disaster to the Federal farm-loan system.

SHOULD SERVE GREATEST INDUSTRY

The Federal farm-loan system was intended to serve America's greatest industry—agriculture. Compared with all other industries, the farm industry is still larger, with its $80,000,000,000 invested capital and enormous turnover. It also employs more men than any other enterprise. Yet this is the only industry in the United States upon which Congress has forced political domination. If political control is not efficient for lesser industries, why did Congress make the farmer the only goat in the country by placing politicians in control of the banking system which the farmers own?

This is a critical question which some of the politicians who forced the system down the throat of farmers will have an opportunity to answer—sad for the politicians—at the election box this fall.

This superpolitical banking system has been instituted at the expense of the farmer and has been attended by the usual reduction of service. The story might have been far different had agriculture enjoyed a sound, sane, and safe banking system, owner-controlled, such as has so long served commerce and industry and which has stood the test of time.

In face of this deplorable situation now Congress is setting about establishing another more gigantic superpolitical system, with a similar political farm-loan board at the head. Congress seems never to learn. They are again going "to do the farmer" at the farmer's expense, and again we shall have a new staff of political wet nurses going around the country to take care of the poor farmers.

The radical suggestors usually are frank enough to acknowledge that they have no faith in the farmer as a business man—beyond the ability of the farmer to feed and clothe them!

A COMPARISON THAT IS STRIKING

Stockholders of our national banks elect every one of the officers of their banks and this procedure has been directly responsible for the creation of a banking system in which all persons have the fullest confidence and good faith. These same banks, if controlled by politicians, would soon prove as unsatisfactory as do the Federal land banks under the present political control.

The National, State, and trust banks of the United States would not for one moment tolerate Congress enacting an amendment to the banking laws which would result in a majority of their directors being political appointees and throwing out the actual owners from management. Why should Congress expect the farmers to stand for any such steal of their property rights, and what sane man can expect these land banks to function as they should while politicians dominate that which is the property of outsiders (farmers) who now have no property rights that they are able to control in the management of the banks?

[Extract from the Forum Magazine, New York City]

LET THE FARMER RUN HIS OWN BANKS

Long since the American farmer has repaid to the United States Treasury the money advanced to capitalize the 12 Federal land banks. This same farmer should now be permitted to occupy a seat in the banking house he has created, and the politicians who have dominated these banks for the past decade should be cast out. The future security and usefulness of this system depends upon this.

The tiller of the soil should be permitted to add banking to his business, as the original farm loan act provided, and the amendment of Congress which deprived the farmer of his property rights should be repealed at once.

The farmer should have under his control a banking system capable of meeting the urgent needs of agriculture. This would place this greatest industry on a par with our smaller enterprises, which have enjoyed private financial support for years, and upon which the soundness of modern business rests and depends for its security and soundness.

Although cooperation has made immense strides in agricultural America in recent years, the establishment of the more than 4,000 cooperative national farm loan associations, serving practically every farm community and section of the country, outstretches any previous achievement in this direction.

Cooperation is in no sense a new idea, but it remained for the permanent establishment of the cooperative Federal farm-loan system to give to the American farmer a cooperative agency national in extent and service. Prior to the advent of these associations and land banks, cooperation thrived only in limited areas and served farmers producing only specialized products, such as apples, cotton, oranges, and tobacco. Thus, the present cooperative banking system of the American farmer stands as the first successful milestone of his united effort on a nation-wide basis.

Many have advised that the American farmer is incapable of teamwork, yet he has builded this, the greatest of all cooperative institutions. He owns the stock and assumes all the liability on a cooperative basis, and has successfully answered the ancient financial problem of the tiller of the soil. Working together as one body, thousands of farmers have solved problems impossible of achievement on individual lines.

For many years prior to the establishment of the Federal farm-loan system, it was apparent that, unless more means was provided to supply money for agricultural purposes, on a long-term amortization plan, and at low interest, agricultural development in the United States would not only cease, but the whole industry would degenerate.

The farmer had hitherto been the ultimate goat, to whom the money lenders successfully passed the buck of high commissions and fat interest rates. Practically alone of all industrial leaders, the farmer was the only one who did not control the money he produced and was forced, under the prevailing system of finance, which was in the hands of outside interests, to pay what was asked.

With this millstone about his neck, the farmer struggled on for the generation after the Civil War, farming becoming less and less profitable and more and more discouraging until in 1916, after every conceivable plan had been considered, Congress borrowed from Europe a plan which had proven successful there and attempted to so modify it as to meet the need of the American farmer. This plan, so modified, is known as the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916.

Those who would aid the farmer to salvation in money matters well appreciated that in this, as in all other agricultural problems, it was a matter for the farmer to himself execute. To establish the system a temporary board was appointed to officer each of the 12 Federal land banks, whose term of office should terminate upon the final payment into the Treasury of the money advanced to the farmer to capitalize these banks.

When we consider that the American farmer owns an $80,000,000,000 enterprise, with a yearly business of more than $20,000,000,000, we soon appreciate that this tiller of the soil is a business man of no small means. And, like all other business men, the farmer requires available finance, plenty of it, when he needs it, to carry on this great business of producing food and clothing.

When we look on the debit side of the farm ledger we discover that the 12,000,000 farmers have mortgages aggregating $8,000,000,000 and that the annual interest on these calls for a tribute of more than $600,000,000 a year or $50,000,000 per month. Statistics recently collected show us that whereas the city merchant, the broker, and other business men, whose security is not as stable as that of the farmer, enjoy interest rates of from 4 to 6 per cent, the farmers of the country, on the average, pay from 8 to 10 per cent interest, and large commissions for their loans.

Many have wondered that the American farmer, our greatest prime producer, has not long since become our capitalistic class. America is the only continent in the world with large agricultural holdings where the land-owning folk are not the capitalists. In Germany, in Great Britain, in Denmark, in France, and even in Japan, to own land is tantamount to having wealth; to be a farmer is to belong to the most powerful class in the country. Why is it that the American farmer, with this same agricultural leadership, does not likewise enjoy the same position as farmers of these foreign lands?

When we set about answering this question, we at once discover that we are in the center of one of the most perplexing problems of the hour; possibly the most vexing and complex of the many reconstruction problems facing the United States to-day; problems that have seriously menaced our agricultural industry ever since the close of the Civil War. We face the manifold problems of farm credits and farm markets. No class of business men in the United States pays a higher interest rate for the money he borrows than does the farmer, and he receives barely 40 per cent of the market price of his produce when he disposes of it.

As America, as a continent, is no longer surrounded by the atmosphere of sweet and contented remoteness from the rest of the world, but must face a world audience in competition in all lines, so also, our greatest business man—the farmer—must compete with farmers of all other countries, not only in foreign markets but also in our markets.

Farmers of Europe, because of their superior loan organizations, have for a generation been able to borrow money upon the same basis as commerce, business, and industry; during the same period our American farmers have paid nearly twice as much, and then have been only inadequately financed.

At present agriculture is on the decadence. I say decadence in the term that agriculture is not now a growingly popular industry. Right now there are two persons in the city and town to the one upon the soil. Our urban population has increased 34 per cent in the past decade. Our rural population has increased by 11 per cent. Ten per cent of our national population now reside in three of our large cities; 60 per cent live in small towns; and but 30 per cent reside out in the open country, upon our farms, and are producers of food and clothing. Yet we meet men every now and then who say that they can not see for the world why farming should not be the most profitable and enjoyable of industries. There must be some reason for the decadence of farming—and there is.

The unsatisfactory, haphazard marketing system now in vogue is one of the most discouraging items, while the $8,000,000,000-mortgage load the farmer carries seems to be the last straw.

The banker is educated in banking; the farmer is trained in farming. We can not expect that the banker will appreciate the vital needs of agriculture when he depends upon city trade for his greater business. Of the 7,613 national banks, book records of 1,247 showed extortionate rates charged farmers for loans. These same banks, while charging the city merchant, manufacturer, storekeeper, railroad operator, and promoter anywhere from 4 to 6 per cent interest, were at the same time charging the farmers they served anywhere from 18 to 60 per cent interest.

The highest rates charged farmers were found in Texas, Oklahoma, North Dakota, Georgia, and Alabama, although 12 per cent was considered very moderate in the Rocky Mountain section.

In other words, if a farm boy wished to become a city merchant, he could go to the average bank and secure a loan at from 4 to 6 per cent. If, however, the same farm boy wished to become a farm operator, the banker looked with disfavor upon him, and charged him several times as much for the use of the same money. These statements are not manufactured to paint a pretty picture but are taken from sworn statements filed by officials of these banks with Members of Congress who investigated the matter.

We need no longer, it would seem, wonder why it is that the modern farm boy goes to the city instead of remaining on the farm. For every dollar loaned on farms, $6 are loaned on city real estate. For every $2.50 loaned on farm lands, $97.50 is loaned on factories.

The railroads of the country seem to believe they face a most grave future. All our railroads put together employ only 2,500,000 men—our farms employ 12,500,000. The railroads support 10,000,000 people; the farms 40,000,000, and feed not alone their own population but the whole country, as well as millions abroad. Nevertheless, through the regular finance channels, our farmers can borrow only one dollar to the ten the railroads borrow.

It was lack of farm financial support at the close of the Civil War, and the resultant evils attached, that were responsible for the mad rush to the cities. Our agricultural industry has never overcome that handicap. At the close of every war in history, it has been noteworthy that money, ready liquid fluid, rushed to the aid of industry and commerce, leaving the farmer to trail his own flocks, pursue his plow, seed his field, harvest his crops, as he might. The farmer has been forced to shift for himself, and without an organization through which to meet his needs or with which to equip himself to cope with existing conditions, agriculture suffered.

SELFISH POLITICIANS DOMINATE SYSTEM

Just as there were certain selfish political interests that would have deprived the American farmer of much-needed farm financial assistance back in 1916, when the farm loan act was passed, so also the same type of selfish politicians have been at hand to deprive the farmer from coming into his own in the establishment of a cooperative farm-loan system, and under the guise of Government supervision have put across a system of political plundering which has resulted in politicians completely dominating the system. This has not only defeated the farmer in enjoyment of his property rights but has resulted in the practical termination of the usefulness of the system to agriculture, so also now, as the farmer-owners of the cooperative Federal farm-loan system are about to come into ownership and control of the system they have created, under Government supervision, there is a minority who would defeat the farmer of the enjoyment of his business.

The war seems to have given a few in this and other countries a conception that a supergovernmental state should be created for all things individual. First, some would have had the Government own and run the railroads. It was well that the radical element did not prevail in that. Then, not content to permit the natural laws of supply and demand to dominate the price of farm produce, a set of radical leaders would have the Government guarantee a fixed price on all farm produce. The sane and sound business farmer prevailed in that test, and the supergovernmental plan passed into vapor.

Because the Federal Government, through its politically appointed directors of the farmers' land banks, first engineered these banks, there is a minority who would continue this plan, despite the fact that the capital of the banks is owned by the farmer borrowers, and the liabilities are all assumed by these farmers. Every farmer who has secured loan service through the Federal farm-land system has been legally forced to subscribe to capital stock in these banks and assume the liability, with the promise that when he had paid back to the Federal Government the advanced capital of the banks, he would come into control and management of them. Of all the radical recommendations made in either America or Russia, the most unique is the one which would have the farmer capitalize a banking system, assume the liabilities, guarantee the bonds which make it possible, and then permit outsiders, especially political appointees, manage and dominate the system, rather than the farmer owners.

Since to deprive the owners of any banking system of the fullest property rights and expressions would be unconstitutional, not to say un-American, and since farmers and sane business men do not wish the United States Government to become banker, baker, and candlestick maker, the present Government operation of the farmer-owned Federal land banks strikes at the basic fundamental principles of our form of government, and is a direct violation of justice and honor on the part of the Congress which withdrew from these property owners the capital-stock control which they possess. How can any political party go to the farmers and ask for votes when they have thus deprived that class of citizens of their just rights?

SUBSIDIES THREATEN SHIP OF STATE

By Henry Swift Ives

Government ownership and control of business may be defined as the substitution of Government deficits for private profits. It is taxation for confiscation. It is the first and last step in the socialist seduction of Democracy. It pretends to take away from those who have for the benefit of those who have not, but in reality it takes away from all to the injury of all.

It is an attempt to subsidize mediocrity by penalizing genius, but actually the only effect of such a subsidy is to make mediocrity even more mediocre. It represses the reproductive processes of capital and then tries to revive them by a tax-gland operation. It is destructive of wealth growth and productive of debt growth. It makes politics instead of business the national dividend producer.

It promotes waste and demotes savings. And its whole tendency leads directly to the ultimate absorption by the State of all private property rights.

Despite this record, which reads like a list of bank suspensions in a bank guaranty State, there has developed in this country a very healthy agitation for the adoption of a system which hasn't worked anywhere else.

We are violently opposed in this country to permitting industry to run the Government, but unfortunately there are many who actually favor Government operation of industry. Both of these ideas of sovereignty are as old as the hills and as sterile as the desert. Each contemplates an autocracy.

The only effect of State interference is to supplant order with confusion. Industry to-day for the most part is two jumps ahead of the requirements of the people; most governmental organizations are two jumps behind.

The one great danger of Democracy is that it may fail to be true to itself; that it may forget its own ideals.

THE COST OF SUBSIDIZED BANKS

The farmers in the agricultural sections of the United States for many years have been striving to get lower interest rates upon farm loans. They think they should be able to borrow capital upon as favorable terms as are ordinarily granted to large manufacturers and commercial concerns. This has been a large factor in keeping the usury laws upon the statute books of the different States.

Usury laws simply do not operate. A statute can not control the market rate for productive loans. All the data submitted shows that these general blanket statutory maximums for all kinds of charges for all kinds of loans are not only powerless but mischievous. But the problem still remains. The farmer wants lower interest rates.

But the securing of lower interest rates for farmers must come in a different way from that of artificially controlling interest rates by statute. Progress is already being made. When steps are taken that will effectually reduce the losses on bad loans by rural bankers, their loan charges will automatically come down.

The Federal land-bank system is an ingenious device to promote the movement of capital into agricultural loans. Each Federal land-bank bond is the obligation of the entire system, and each loan made as a basis of the bonds is subjected to a set of strict standards before it is approved. This operates to even up the differences in agricultural interest rates.

The exempting of Federal land-bank bonds and joint-stock land-bank bonds from income taxes is an additional method by which interest rates are being cut down for the farmer. This, in reality, is subsidizing the farmer. By this system he is enabled to borrow at lower rates because of the low rates at which the bonds sell. But the taxes which the bondholders escape paying by this method must be paid by other taxpayers, who thus pay extra taxes in order that the farmer may borrow at lower rates. I do not think that this method of getting lower rates of interest for farmers is socially justifiable.

The best measures that are being taken are along the lines of pooling the credit standing of the community and holding up the economic solidarity of the farm neighborhood. If the results obtained by this method in European countries can be gotten here it will not be many years until interest rates will be much lower in the agricultural sections of the South and West.

THE SYSTEM LACKS CONFIDENCE OF FARMERS

The story is told of a certain monastic brother who, with others of his order, built a mission in what is now the Republic of Panama. Because this story seems to carry a business moral we are using it as the basis for the January editorial.

The mission brothers who carried civilization into the dark places in the early days were of sturdy pioneer stock, inured to hardships, and of self-sacrificing temperament. The little company that decided to build the mission in Panama were of necessity both architects and artisans.

The materials were wrested from nature, toilsomely transported by semiprimitive methods, and converted into the buildings that even to-day stand as monuments to their painstaking craftmanship.

One of the problems confronting these builders was the erection of an arch. Many times this arch was erected, but when the last stone was set it refused to stand. Undaunted by failure, however, one after another tried to so design and build the arch that it would stand, and finally, after many had failed, one of the brothers stepped forward and accepted the responsibility.

The arch was built according to his plans and under his supervision. When the last stone was about to be set this man stood under it. "If it falls, let it fall on me," he said. But the arch did not fall. It stands to-day and is called the flat arch. It is visited by tourists, and is known the world over, and so is the designer whose confidence in his work was so great that he was willing to accept full responsibility, even to risking his life.

In this story there is a moral that is applicable to our business. On every hand we hear of guaranties of performance. Some of them mean a great deal and are conscientiously backed up by every ounce of energy and intelligence that the organizations making them are capable to muster; but too often these guaranties are empty promises, just plain words, nothing more.

To the farm-mortgage banker who builds and yet steps aside, as did the brothers who failed in their efforts to build the arch, there is a lesson in the act of the brother who stood squarely under the arch. He accepted responsibility—he backed his guaranty with every resource at his command. He did not make wonderful promises and fall short on delivery.

In business we must stand under the arch squarely—we must meet every condition fairly. The farm financier or business man who fails to do this will inevitably forfeit the confidence of his patrons, and leadership will just as surely accrue to his competitor who says: "If it falls, let it fall on me." This is graphically illustrated in a nation-wide banking system, enjoying all the special privileges which a kind Congress could surround it with, but which continues to want for the confidence of the special class it was to serve, because that class knows that the men back of the system are not willing to stand under the arch which they have builded.

FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT-CONTROLLED BANKS

Financial credit can only be expected in directions to which sound methods of finance can be applied, and the chief essential is the question of adequate security. We can not have a healthy financial system while credit is granted on inadequate security, though we may have a seeming prosperity, which is as dangerous as it is unreal, leading people into ill-considered courses of an extravagant and speculative character.

Such have been the results of the unwise and artificial aids to agriculture which have been granted by governments in the United States, and which have aggravated rather than mitigated the agricultural depression in that country.

Legitimate and rational credit is good for a community and must be available if progress is to be achieved. The benefit is twofold, because the premises presuppose, on the one hand, the use of borrowed funds in remunerative enterprise and on the other the employment of surplus funds which otherwise would be idle and the encouragement of the thrifty to lay aside further savings.

Capital for the most part represents the savings made by the sacrifice of thrifty and thoughtful persons for definite purposes, and it is derived from a great variety of sources. Every wage-earner who deposits a dollar or so a week; every merchant who sets aside a portion of the profits of a good year; every policyholder who pays a life-insurance premium, makes a contribution to the working capital of the world, and all capital originally was created from such sources. The motives involved can be roughly thrown into two classes—provision for old age and provision for dependents.

GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS

Public ownership or Government operation appears to have been successful and perhaps necessary in activities which can be most effectively conducted as monopolies. The post-office system is an obvious instance. But in fields where numerous private corporations are competing for business, the entry of governments is a very dubious venture. If the Government departments propose to work along exactly the same lines as the private corporations, past history seems to teach that such enterprises will be unsuccessful because of the greater efficiency, initiative, and resourcefulness of the private competition.

Governments have usually embarked in such undertakings on the theory that the private corporations were not adequately covering the field. It may be assumed that, wherever fields have not been adequately exploited by private enterprises, it has been because those fields did not appear attractive or profitable. Accordingly the chance for governmental success is reduced to a minimum.

Governmental activities with respect to farm credits have been undertaken in the face of the strong competition of many private corporations and to the extent that they have gone beyond the limits which the private corporations considered prudent; they should be considered as in the nature of special concessions to agriculture at the expense, or at least at the risk, of the whole community. Too often they deceive themselves into believing that the enterprise will be self-sustaining or even profitable, and they close their eyes to the growing deficits until they become almost a scandal.

On other occasions they drive private capital out of the field by unwise legislation and when they realize their mistake they then engage in the business themselves, taking care that their debtors will not have the same privileges against them that they insist they must have against the private corporations!

In Alberta the new provincial farm loans act authorizes the forfeiture of a mortgagee's farm immediately after he has failed for two months to pay interest and the unfortunate borrower has no right to any stay or court redress. What great opportunities for political control are involved in such wide powers! What disregard is suggested for all the principles of fair play which have been recommended with such emphasis to private mortgagees!

On the whole, it is safe to say that the entry of governments into the field of agricultural credits has been and will be costly to the public and not particularly valuable even to those intended to benefit.

It is customary to make farm loans for a period of five years and frequently provision is made for the payment of a small amount of the principal yearly. It is not always expected that the borrowers will be able, out of income, to pay off the loan in five years, but the five-year period affords an opportunity to make any readjustments which either the borrower or the lender may desire.

Theoretically, the plan of making mortgage loans for longer periods and providing for their repayment by amortization is sound and attractive. Few people know what the word amortization means, and some appear to think very doubtful whether the amortization methods is of any real practical value in connection with farm loans. It presupposes very regular payments, and if these are not made the account is thrown into confusion. In all probability any company which starts to apply the amortization plan will soon find itself in practice operating under the old-fashioned method by collecting substantial amounts in good years and allowing what leniency it can under other conditions. In brief, the amortization plan is too inelastic for practical purposes, at least with relation to farm loans.

BUREAUCRACY

"In the past 18 months there has arisen a particular secretarial psychology, the main feature of which is the conviction that a secretary is in a position to decide upon any and every question without knowing anything about the matter. At every step and point we see how comrades, who showed no organizing or administrative capacities * * * decide in a dictatorial manner economic and other questions the moment they are appointed to a post. By the application of these secretarial methods the bureaucratization of the party apparatus has developed to an enormous extent. A bureaucracy is unsound and unhealthy."

Guess who wrote these words. No; you are wrong; although the above aptly describes the too often modern American method of doing things, the paragraph describes conditions in red Russia. No less an observer than Leo Davidovich Trotzky, "Lion of Bolshevism," points to the future of failure awaiting Russia unless she puts greater faith in individual effort and less in political bureaucrats. Nevertheless, Trotzky describes a prevalent American custom, fraught with the same unhealthy future.

To those who find themselves under the necessity of awaiting the decision of the All Highest ere they are able to effect changes to meet conditions as they may exist, Trotzky's further indictment of bureaucracy reads almost like homemade common sense, to wit:

"The Communist Party lives on two floors. On the upper one decisions are made. Those who live on the lower merely hear about them."

Government subsidization, whether termed as soviet or bolshevik in Russian, or republican taking-over in America, results the same way. Stagnation soon spells what at first was warmly greeted as supervision or subsidization by a procrastinating, paternalistic government bureau. It was a wise man who wrote, "The touch of government in business is the touch of death."

WHY FEDERAL OPERATION OF LAND-BANK SYSTEM IS INEFFICIENT AND DESTRUCTIVE

(By Herbert N. Casson)

Speaking quietly, without rage and prejudice, can anyone tell why all government departments in all countries are slow, wasteful, and incompetent?

There must be some basic reason for this, as the individuals in these departments can not all be inferior to the individuals in private firms.

Almost invariably an able man becomes disabled when he is placed in a government department.

He becomes timid, procrastinating, noncommittal, evasive, and unprofitable. He becomes a mere chattel of routine.

Why is this?

The fact seems to be that man simply can not be competent in a Government job, for the following reasons:

1. There is no payment for results. There is no piecework. There is no profit sharing. A man gets as much for doing badly as he does for doing well.

2. There is no fear of discharge. A man may be transferred, but as long as his conduct is satisfactory he can not be discharged for incompetence. Any sort of a fool can hold a job forever in a civil service.

3. There are no profits to be made. There is no possibility of bankruptcy. If the department doesn't pay, very well; the Treasury has plenty.

4. There is no danger of losing customers. A Government department does not depend upon its customs, so that it has no incentive to be quick and courteous and obliging.

5. The main thing is accuracy, not success. A Government employee has simply nothing to do with success. His aim is to avoid mistakes. The less he does, the fewer mistakes.

6. Time is of no consequence. As all Government employees are made into clerks they come to have a clerk's disregard for time. To clerks, as to lawyers, a delay is a relief and a comfort—the more the better.

7. The work is impersonal. There is very little personal responsibility in a Government office. The clerks have arranged a system whereby nobody is to blame, no matter what happens.

8. There is no competition. A Government department is always a monopoly. If it were not, it would soon be thrown aside. It has no competition to battle with, and it can take its ease and do as it pleases.

9. Routine is put ahead of service. In Government departments all the workers—if I may use the word—are tied with red tape. They are all the slaves of a system of procedure.

10. There is no enthusiasm. If a man stays in a Government job long enough, he becomes mummified. He loses all the energy and joy of living that are so necessary to efficiency and success.

These are only a few reasons why the presently constituted politically dominated Federal farm-loan system is a failure—why any nationalization plan has always been a failure and always will be.

Just put yourself in the place of the poor automats who run these superpolitical systems. No matter how able you are, how could you be efficient if you had:

No hope of profits, no fear of failure;

No competitors, no customers;

No reason of hurry; and

No danger of being found out.

Nationalization is the destroyer of efficiency, commerce, and industry. It is not only a coral reef built across the harbor of prosperity. It is worse. It is far worse. It is a destroyer of men. It takes an able man and grinds him down until he is a clerical drudge. This is the thing that, in a very short time, ruined the great Federal farm-loan system, which, under private initiative, might have become a mighty useful instrument in assisting our greatest industry—agriculture. Instead, the system now is a deplorable example of the failure of Government to function in behalf of those it was created to assist, and only prepares profitable jobs for political appointees whose chief interest in their jobs is the pay they receive.

FARM RELIEF

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Mr. George N. Peek, chairman of the executive Committee of Twenty-two, North Central States Agricultural Conference. This conference was organized at the meeting of governors or their delegates from the 12 North Central States, called by Gov. John Hamill, of Iowa, in January, 1926. The purpose of the committee is to back organized agriculture in its effort to secure economic equality with industry.

Mr. Peek is also president of the American Council of Agriculture, organized in St. Paul in July, 1924. This was the first big meeting of farm leaders held after the defeat of the McNary-Haugen bill in 1924.

Prior to 1924 Mr. Peek was the president of the Moline Plow Co. and vice president of Deere & Co. and had been in the implement business since 1893. During the war he was commissioner of finished products of the War Industries Board. He is co-author of the original brief Equality for Agriculture.

This brief formed the basis of all the McNary-Haugen bills which have been before Congress. More than any other one man in the Nation, he knows the history of the legislation, the opposition it has encountered, and the underlying forces behind the tragic deflation of the farmer. He tells it in this memorandum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

HERBERT HOOVER AND THE FARMER

By George N. Peek

Two campaign booklets have appeared and are being widely distributed in the political interest of Herbert Hoover. One is entitled "Herbert Hoover's Record as a Friend of the American Farmer," the other is "A Condensation of Statements by Herbert Hoover" on "some long-view policies for improvement of the farmers' profit."

The purpose of the documents obviously is to gain Hoover support from farmers in the pending presidential campaign. They contain material clearly calculated to serve that purpose. It is utterly impossible, however, for any propaganda to conceal or disguise the all-important fact that—

Herbert Hoover is, and has been since 1917, the arch enemy of a square deal for agriculture.

First, as food administrator, and later as the agricultural advisor of the last two administrations, he is more directly and personally responsible for the present plight of the American farmer than any other man in the Nation, although his machinations have been well concealed under a flood of propaganda.

This is well and generally understood by responsible leaders of farm organizations, particularly those serving farmers in the grain and livestock States, regardless of the statements of Mr. Hoover or of any of his friends, whether or not they be present or past farm leaders, Members of the Congress, Government officials, or private citizens.

No comment is made in this memorandum on his work in administering relief in foreign countries; that is not the record in which the farmers now, or for seven years, have been particularly interested. They are interested in knowing the facts in connection with Mr. Hoover's actions as food administrator and as Secretary of Commerce, as these actions affected the prices of their raw products, as distinguished from the prices of finished or semifinished food products; also, as to his actions as they have delayed sound relief measures in the interest of farmers, as distinguished from any representations or misrepresentations made on his behalf by anyone, including himself.

I

MR. HOOVER, FOOD ADMINISTRATOR

Before the food-control act creating the food administration was passed in the summer of 1917 Herbert Hoover was brought back from Europe with the understanding that he was to be the food administrator for the United States.

I am unable to state just what forces, working on his behalf, brought about his appointment. It has been suggested that it was secured through the influence of the allied nations, led by England, who wanted wheat and meat from the United States and wanted them cheap.

The effects upon the American farmer of his acts as food administrator are well known. They constitute a record that condemns him, and he will never be able to escape from the indictment of that record, no matter how many paid economists or others write books in its extenuation and defense.

THE DEFENSE OF HOOVER VERSUS THE TRUTH

The entire defense of Hoover's agricultural record as food administrator in the booklets to which I refer is based upon studies prepared by a man who was in the employ of Hoover or of a Hoover agency when he wrote them. The pamphlet entitled "Herbert Hoover's Record as a Friend of the American Farmer," is drawn almost wholly from that source. Its most important statements as to the effect of Mr. Hoover's operations as food administrator do not accord with the facts as the farmers know them. The pamphlet seeks to excuse Mr. Hoover in connection with the war price of wheat in the United States by attempting to place the responsibility on the wheat price committee which recommended the "fair price" for the 1917 crop, after Congress had passed the law guaranteeing that the wheat price in this country commencing with the 1918 crop should not fall below $2.

The truth is that after Congress had passed legislation in 1917 guaranteeing the farmers a minimum price of wheat to stimulate production Mr. Hoover, as food administrator, without a shadow of authority from Congress, so manipulated the wheat market that he held down the price of wheat at all times to the minimum figure fixed by the President's proclamation.

HOOVER AND WHEAT PRICES

Farmers do not so much protest against the minimum price that was named as against the fact that under Mr. Hoover's manipulations through the United States Grain Corporation, headed by his friend, Julius Barnes, America's largest grain exporter, this guaranteed minimum price was made—in effect, fixed a maximum price.

Congressman CHARLES BRAND, of Ohio, expressed what is common knowledge among farm leaders when he said in his speech of March 13, 1928:

"Agreements were made with millers and country dealers not to pay above a fixed price; and during the latter part of the period the law was enforced, prices were kept from rising by controlling miller's margin on the basis of cost of production and the 'fair price of wheat.'"

The Hoover pamphlet referred to says, for example:

"Unless some action were taken it was clear that the American farmer would receive only $1.50 a bushel for his wheat, and the price was rapidly declining toward that point."

The truth is that as the 1917 season advanced wheat prices in this country kept rising until wheat was selling at $3.40 a bushel in May, and the decline set in only when news of the action of the wheat committee and the contemplated activities of the food administration spread throughout the country.

The truth is it was Mr. Hoover's wish and intention to force down wheat prices. Congressman BRAND, in the speech above referred to, said:

"In the spring of 1917, testifying before the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. Hoover said: 'The reaction of Europe has left our prices for farm products above an endurable level and will, if we do nothing, raise them still higher, for their need grows yearly. By our entry into the war we arrived at two issues (1) the issue must have plainly fronted us in any event, the control of our food so as to ameliorate prices, (2) that we may also meet the increased demand of our allies.' * * *

"Before the committee in the Senate Mr. Hoover advocated a price of $1.50 per bushel."

On May 1, 1918, Mr. Hoover said in an address at a conference of grain dealers with the grain corporation:

"I agree with the contention of some farmers that they would be getting $5 and, perhaps, $10 a bushel for their wheat had it not been for the restraints imposed by the Government."

The truth is the aim and purpose of the United States Grain Corporation was to hold down the price of wheat.

Julius Barnes (then president of the United States Grain Corporation), shortly after he became wheat director in 1919, said:

"For two years it has not been a question of holding the price of wheat at the guaranteed level so much as preventing it from soaring above that fair price level."

How the grain corporation helped to accomplish this is explained by incidents such as the following:

Early in May the grain corporation negotiated the purchase of 4,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat for American mills. The aim and effect was to hold American wheat prices down—and it worked.

The pamphlet referred to says:

"The allied governments had fixed the price of wheat in their own countries at about $1.80 a bushel."

The truth is the foreign governments paid more than $2.20 to their own producers. France paid the equivalent of $3.94 a bushel; Italy, $4.33; the Netherlands, $3.23; Portugal, $3.83; Spain, $3.96; Sweden, $2.95; Switzerland, $3.25; United Kingdom, $2.28; Austria-Hungary, $2.21; Algeria, $2.36.

The Hoover pamphlet also claims:

"The price was relatively higher than that of any agricultural commodity in which there was a free market * * *."

The falsity of this claim can easily be demonstrated. It is interesting to note, for example, the movement in the price of rye, which was not controlled, which suggests what might have happened in the price of wheat had the price not been held down. The average price of No. 2 rye at Chicago in March, 1918, was $2.84, while No. 2 red winter wheat was $2.17 a bushel. With rye at that price, assuming that the relationship of the price of wheat to the price of rye would have remained the same as the pre-war average relationship, wheat would have been selling for about $3.40 a bushel. This high price for rye was realized notwithstanding that the United States had the largest crop it had ever produced and regardless of the fact that European purchases were made through a single agency.

The Hoover pamphlet says:

"Had it not been for this support by the Grain Corporation under plans suggested by Mr. Hoover, the price [of wheat] would have collapsed in 1919, because of the inrush of wheat accumulations from South America."

Contrast such a claim with the statement which Mr. Hoover himself gave out in the spring of 1919 to the effect—

"That the foreign demand was so great that if purchases could be financed and if shipping could be secured wheat would go to $5 a bushel."

At the time this statement stimulated speculation in wheat and food products, although this was not in the interest of farmers who then had largely sold their wheat.

HOOVER AND LIVESTOCK PRICES

Notwithstanding claims made on his behalf, Mr. Hoover's record of pursuing a course that damaged agriculture, and then relying upon propaganda to save him from retaliation of the farmers, is just as bad as far as the livestock and corn growers are concerned as it was with wheat.

It has been stated, and it has not been denied by Mr. Hoover, that he said that his way of aiding the livestock grower was to depress the price of corn.

He said in the fall of 1917 (according to William Hirth, of the Missouri Farmers' Association and now chairman of the Corn Belt Federation of Farm Organizations):

"I know the livestock men are not receiving a price in keeping with their feeding costs, but I think the thing to do is to depress the price of corn until it is in line with the livestock markets."

Further, Mr. Hoover threatened in the fall of 1917 to take over the packing houses of the Nation if the packers permitted livestock prices to rise. On this point Mr. Hirth says:

"Prof. E. Dana Durand, who was one of his [Hoover's] chief emissaries, went to the packers and told them that if they permitted any material advance in the price of livestock that Mr. Hoover would demand that Congress give him charge of the packing plants for the period of the war."

GIFFORD PINCHOT ON HOOVER

Writing to Henry C. Wallace, who was Secretary of Agriculture under Presidents Harding and Coolidge until his death in October, 1924, Hon. Gifford Pinchot, formerly Governor of Pennsylvania, under date of February 17, 1918, said, in reference to Hoover:

"It is curious to find a man born on a farm in Iowa, as Hoover was, showing such blindness toward everything that affects and controls the farmer, but we both have met cases before where later education had wiped out an earlier training. In Hoover's case the mining engineer has won against the earlier farm boy, and has eliminated him.

"The Food Administration has been run upon the theory that the great special interests, such as the packers, the canners, the millers, should first be invited to suggest their own conditions and prices—and often their own men as well—and must then be persuaded voluntarily to accept such modifications of these proposals as the Food Administration found it to be indispensable to make, although the law had given them completely into Hoover's hand. But the farmer, the most independent of men, the last man to starve, who can be affected by persuasion alone, whose will to produce is beyond the reach of authority, was to be given his orders and told to go and carry them out. With all the blunders of all the ages to pick from, in the language of the cartoonist, 'Can you beat it?'

"Under these circumstances, with the food problem divided along unworkable lines, handled on the theory that price, distribution, and conservation have nothing to do with production, * * * with the power of the Food Administration largely in the hands of men nominated by and representing the packers and other great special interests, * * * it seems to me as if the full measure of possible mistakes had been pretty well filled to the brim. * * * Add to all this that Hoover began his services as food administrator with a contempt for public opinion, which has since been converted into supersensitiveness to temporary clamor, and you have a situation which could hardly result in anything less than disaster."

HIRTH GIVES FARMER'S VIEW

Mr. Hirth sums up the viewpoint of the corn, wheat, and livestock farmers on Mr. Hoover's record as food administrator in the following language:

"The manner in which farmers were treated during the war and since is a chapter of infamy without precedent in the history of the Nation. While the war was in progress the shout that 'Food will win the war' filled the land morning, noon, and night, and in order to serve the Nation in its hour of peril, the wives and daughters of the farmers worked in the fields from sunup till sunset—they had to do this because the sons were either at the training camps or in France. But when it became evident that our food supplies would be ample, Hoover turned a deaf ear to their pleas for a square deal. * * * And if, in the face of these facts, the Republican leaders dare to nominate Hoover for President, let them take the consequences—I repeat that the avenging wrath of the Corn Belt will be such that they will not forget it for the next 50 years."

HOOVER'S POSTWAR ATTITUDE

Another chapter, of course, is added by Mr. Hoover's attitude toward the farm-surplus problem since the war. More than any other man he was responsible for such expansion of agricultural production as occurred during the war. Therefore he bears a greater responsibility than any other man for the postwar condition of agriculture. Yet his attitude for seven years may be summed up as this—

"That if the farmers were fools enough to believe what he told them in war times, so that their total production can be sold only at ruinous prices, let them take the consequences. The only remedy is to let prices get so low that part of the farmers will be starved out in sufficient number to let the rest of them produce at a living wage."

This epitomizes the Hoover viewpoint as Food Administrator, and since, and the farmers know it.

II

MR. HOOVER, SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

Shortly after Mr. Hoover went into the Cabinet in 1921 he undertook to get control of the Bureau of Markets in the Department of Agriculture.

It was then, and it now is, believed by farm leaders in the Middle West who were familiar with his activities that he sought the transfer in the interest of private dealers, speculators, and manufacturers of farm products, the interests of the first two groups particularly being directly opposed to the interests of cooperative associations of producers.

Conspicuous in these groups was Julius Barnes, who became president of the United States Chamber of Commerce and who used this high office to prejudice business throughout the country against adequate legislation for the farmers.

It is worthy of note that the officers of the United States Chamber of Commerce have persistently opposed adequate farm legislation, particularly the McNary-Haugen bill, although they failed to submit the question to a referendum of the membership, as is the usual custom of the chamber.

It is believed now that any plan for agricultural relief to be satisfactory to Mr. Hoover must further shelter and entrench the private dealers in the marketing system, and that his actions do not confirm his statements of his interest in the welfare of cooperative marketing under the control of the farmer. On the other hand, they do indicate that his sympathies are with and his activities have been in the interest of the existing system of exchanges, boards of trade, packers, millers, and the multiplicity of middlemen, and that he would put the power of government behind them instead of behind associations of producers.

HOOVER SEEKS TO CONTROL MARKETING OF FARM PRODUCTS

In seeking control of the Bureau of Markets Mr. Hoover indicated clearly that in his opinion it was the duty of the Department of Agriculture to look after production only and that his department (Commerce) should look after distribution. His views were expressed in the following language in 1921:

"* * * the functions of the Department of Agriculture should end when production on the farm is complete and movement therefrom starts, and at that point the activities of the Department of Commerce should begin.

"Broadly speaking, the functions of the Department of Agriculture relating to soil production should end when the grain, fruit, or animal moves from the farm and the tree from the forest, and the Department of Commerce should take up its activities when manufacture, transportation, and distribution begin.

"The Department of Agriculture should tell the farmer what he can best produce, based on soil, climatic, and other cultural conditions, and the Department of Commerce should tell him how best to dispose of it."

Mr. Hoover has attempted to deny that he ever undertook to secure this transfer, but the evidence is overwhelmingly against him.

HOOVER OPPOSES WALLACE

It was no secret among the friends of Secretary Wallace and particularly among the farm leaders of the Middle West that he was constantly opposed and harassed by Mr. Hoover during both the Harding and Coolidge administrations, in almost every effort to rehabilitate agriculture. Not only did Hoover attempt to get hold of the Bureau of Markets and the Foreign Service of the Department of Agriculture, but later he opposed the department's proposals for relief.

FARM ORGANIZATIONS INTERVENE

In the summer of 1924, following the defeat in the Sixty-eighth Congress of the McNary-Haugen bill, which was prepared under the direction of Secretary Wallace, a great meeting of farm organization leaders was held in St. Paul to consider future procedure. It was recognized by this conference that the subject was economic and not political in a partisan sense, and it was agreed that these leaders would support and would urge their membership to support those candidates for Congress who had supported the McNary-Haugen bill, regardless of partisanship. The conference took no position on presidential candidates, as the platforms of both parties were satisfactory in respect to agriculture and it was not anticipated that these pledges would be repudiated.

Under date of July 31, 1924, as president of the American Council of Agriculture, formed at the St. Paul meeting, in conjunction with F. W. Murphy, chairman of the executive committee, and R. A. Cowles, secretary, I addressed a letter to President Coolidge seeking to divorce the farm question from partisan politics because both parties in their conventions had adopted platforms acceptable to agriculture. I quote from this letter:

"As a means of clarifying all included questions of economics, practicability, and urgency in an atmosphere purged of the elements of partisan and other selfish controversy, and to do so in ample season before the next convention of Congress, the council, speaking in its proper right for the farm population of the United States, respectfully and earnestly hereby petitions you to direct the Secretary of Agriculture to immediately appoint and convene an extraordinary commission to study the situation and needs of agriculture and to recommend definite remedial legislation to Congress with a view to its enactment during the short session. To be consistent with the spirit of these purposes, such a commission should obviously be nonpartisan, should fairly represent agriculture, and should not comprise spokesmen for interests whose circumstances or conduct shows them to be inherently obtuse or selfishly inimical to the project of securing equality for agriculture under our protective system."

Several letters passed between C. Bascom Slemp, then private secretary to Mr. Coolidge and now a Hoover supporter, and the council (pp. 449 to 454, House agricultural relief hearings, serial CC, pt. 13, 1925). These indicate that Mr. Slemp did not place the letter of July 31 before President Coolidge until September 11, 1924, and that some one did not favor the Secretary of Agriculture [Mr. Wallace] calling the conference because he was recognized as a true friend of agriculture. On the other hand, Mr. Slemp was evasive and refrained from making a reply to the direct question asking if the letter of the council had been placed before the President.

On October 6, 1924, the request was withdrawn by the council in the following telegram to Mr. Coolidge:

"The executive committee of the American Council of Agriculture in session to-day decided that owing to the time which has elapsed since it made its request under date of July 31 for the appointment of an agricultural commission and the proximity of the coming election and the opening of the December session of Congress, it respectfully hereby withdraws said request for the appointment of an agricultural commission."

Meanwhile the council was informed by Mr. Slemp on August 29—"that the President * * * in his speech of acceptance * * * very definitely stated that he intended to establish such a commission for precisely the purpose your council has in mind."

Immediately after election Mr. Coolidge announced the personnel of the conference, all of the Hoover persuasion. Shortly before his death Mr. Wallace told me and others that every single name suggested to the President by him had been crossed off the list of proposals which he had seen in Mr. Slemp's office.

THE PRESIDENT'S CONFERENCE

The conference convened late in 1924, and its first report was made public on January 28, 1925. It aroused general surprise and indignation among the farm leaders who were in Washington. Later Senator NORRIS, then chairman of the Agricultural Committee in the Senate, put in the record quotations from a letter received by him from one of the members of the conference indicating that the conference was not expected to bring in constructive proposals dealing with the surplus problem.

On February 16, 1925, I went before the Committee on Agriculture in the House, and a day or two later before the Senate committee, presented certain evidence and urged an investigation of the activities of Mr. Hoover, and protested against some of the recommendations of the President's agricultural conference.

I quote from my testimony at that time pages 457–458, hearings, H. R. serial CC, part 13, February 16, 1925:

"I most respectfully and earnestly urge—

"The appointment of a congressional committee of either the House of Representatives or of the Senate, or both, to investigate—

"(a) Mr. Hoover's activities in encroaching either personally or through his department upon the functions of the Department of Agriculture. These are, I think, in conflict with the fundamental law creating the department.

"(b) Mr. Hoover's connection, directly or indirectly, with the recommendations of the President's agricultural conference; his connection with the reports and publicity of that conference and his part in defining an agricultural policy contrary to the traditions of American agriculture.

"(c) His well-known friendship and connection, if any, with exporters of farm products.

"(d) Mr. Hoover's connection with the report and publicity that the resignation of certain bureau chiefs in the Department of Agriculture would soon be requested. It is only just that the rights of great and good men, who have loyally supported the policies of the head of their department, should be protected before their life work is relegated to the scrap heap."

In connection with the recommendations of the President's agricultural conference, I said, pages 455–456 (same hearings):

"I must, therefore, protest against that recommendation of the conference 'there must, therefore, be established a balanced American agriculture by which production is kept in step with the demand of domestic markets and only such foreign markets as may be profitable.'

"I, respectfully, but with all the earnestness I possess, protest against the adoption of a national policy such as is suggested by this recommendation. I can only conclude that it means that agriculture must stop exporting, that cotton, tobacco, wheat, corn, rice, and livestock production must be restricted to domestic requirements, while industry, I assume, is to be permitted to continue in the exporting business, selling its surpluses in the world market at world prices independent of the portion used in America * * *. This would mean that millions more of our farmers must be starved out until domestic production is reduced to domestic requirements. * * *

"In whose interest is such a policy? Certainly not in the interest of the American farmer, certainly not in the interest of American industry and labor, since approximately 90 per cent of our commerce is domestic and further impairment of domestic buying power means impairment of industry and wages. Certainly not in the interest of American finance, which depends for its earnings upon a prosperous America. Certainly not in the interest of American railroads, which are dependent upon a prosperous America.

"I conceive it to be only in the interest of exporters of farm products, who profit by buying them at low prices in America and selling them at high prices in foreign markets."

I think now, as I did then, that the exporters know that if nothing is done they will be free to continue their exploitation of the farmer because production can not be controlled.

Mr. Hoover's activities in seeking to dominate the Department of Agriculture have continued, the policy of starving out acreage has been continued, his association with Mr. Barnes has continued, and the bureau chiefs, Dr. H. C. Taylor and Charles J. Brand, were forced out of the department in the spring of 1925 shortly after Congress adjourned.

EFFECT OF HOOVER POLICIES

I challenged then, and I challenge now, the economic soundness and the wisdom of the conference recommendations which were Hoover policies. The effect upon American agriculture and business in agricultural districts may be epitomized as follows:

Decrease in farm property values between 1920 and 1925, $20,000,000,000.

Increase in farm debt between 1910 and 1925, $12,000,000,000, and further increase between 1920 and 1925, $2,000,000,000.

Migration from the farm since 1920, 2,000,000 a year.

Increase in farm bankruptcies, over 1,000 per cent.

Bank failures 1910–1914, inclusive, 319, and from 1921 to 1927, inclusive, 3,917.

Commercial failures have increased from an average of 15,172 yearly in the five years from 1910–1914 to a yearly average of 21,250 from 1921–1927.

The largest increase in number of both bank and commercial failures has been in the territory west and south of the New England and Middle Atlantic States, that territory which had the least industrial expansion on account of war contracts.

MR. HOOVER'S "LONG VIEW POLICIES FOR IMPROVEMENT OF THE FARMER'S PROFIT"

There is nothing new in the statements in Mr. Hoover's pamphlet, Some Long View Policies for Improvement of the Farmer's Profit, concerning the problem; it "listens" well. But it is to his actions, and to some of the remedies he proposes for the farmer's troubles, rather than to his words, that the farm leaders object.

Mr. Hoover says:

"I am the firm exponent of cooperative marketing or other form of marketing facilities under the control of the farmer. * * *

"There is this limit, however, to the efficacy of cooperative marketing; it will not save the farmer from continuous overproduction. Continuous overproduction means 'unmanageable' surplus, and that can only be corrected by prices low enough to make production unprofitable for some part of the acreage in use.

"We should not mislead ourselves into thinking that cooperation is the complete solution to the problem of marketing all agricultural produce. * * *

"I am convinced that the recommendations of the President's conference (1924–25) are practical and far-sighted in the encouragement they give to thorough marketing organizations within the industry. The main issue in these recommendations is the creation of a Federal cooperative marketing board which shall * * * develop every avenue of progress for the cooperative movement. * * *"

While Mr. Hoover says he is—

"* * * the exponent of cooperative marketing associations under the control of the farmer"—

he advocated the recommendations of the President's conference in 1925 for a Federal cooperative marketing board, which were incorporated into a bill (H. R. 12348) in February, 1925, and which, if this bill had passed, would have placed cooperatives under Government regulation, supervision, and control.

FARM ORGANIZATIONS OPPOSE HOOVER PROGRAM

The provisions of this bill were so objectionable to the cooperative associations of producers and to the general farm organizations that almost without exception they vigorously opposed its passage.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 21, 1925, contains statements of protest against the measure from many farm organizations. I quote from the statement of the National Cooperative Milk Producers Association (p. 4344), which epitomizes the objectionable features of the bill.

"Its provisions are in line with the idea of Government regulation, supervision, and promotion * * * which is diametrically opposed to the principle of self-help cooperative marketing coming from and being operated wholly by and at the will of the producers." * * * It "opens the door of the antitrust laws to combinations of distributors with cooperative associations and to the possibility of 'dummy' cooperatives being operated for the purposes of and to the advantage of combinations of distributors."

Bear in mind that this was a Hoover bill to which the farm organizations objected. It was defeated by the substitution of the Dickinson amendment, really aimed to encourage genuine associations of producers, after a bitter fight on the floor of the House of Representatives. The Senate did not vote on the bill.

FARM ORGANIZATIONS NOT MISLED

As to our misleading ourselves—

"into thinking that cooperation is the complete solution to the problem of marketing all agricultural produce"—

there is no danger of farm leaders and particularly the heads of large-scale cooperative associations misleading themselves. They are concerned, however, for fear the statements of Mr. Hoover and others high in administration circles will continue to mislead the American public and Congress.

As far back as March, 1924, when the first McNary-Haugen bill was under consideration by Congress, such leading farm organizations as the American Farm Bureau Federation, American National Live Stock Association, American Wheat Growers Associated, Corn Belt Meat Producers Association, Indiana Wheat Growers' Association, National Board of Farm Organizations, National Grange, and the National Live Stock Producers Association published a pamphlet giving their views on the McNary-Haugen bill then before Congress. Among other subjects they refer to the limitations of cooperative marketing. This statement is attached hereto. (Exhibit 1.) It shows conclusively that farmers then recognized the limitations of cooperative marketing.

While advocating cooperative marketing, Mr. Hoover says:

"The burden of participating in this partial loss—on a portion of a crop—can only be distributed if all the producers will enter into cooperation. If they will not, a fair price for their main products is destroyed with every excessive season."

He has always opposed and still continues his opposition to the equalization fee, however, although the large-scale cooperatives insist that it is essential to their successful operation, and he has had nothing to offer in its place.

HOOVER AND THE SURPLUS

Mr. Hoover says:

"Continuous overproduction, unmanageable surplus, can only be corrected by prices low enough to make production unprofitable for some part of the acreage in use."

This view is expressed in another way in the report of the President's conference, which was generally known by farm leaders to have been picked and dominated by Mr. Hoover. (S. Doc. No. 190, January 28, 1925.)

"There must, therefore, be established a balanced American agriculture by which production is kept in step with the demand of domestic markets and with only such foreign markets as may be profitable."

In the Pacific Ruralist of February 7, 1925, Mr. Hoover says:

"Generally the fundamental need is a balancing of agricultural production to our home demand."

He does not say how the farmer is to control his production, which obviously is impossible.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture points out (Senate committee report on S. 3555, p. 8):

"Crop production varies both because of changes in acreage, which farmers can control, and because of changes in yields, most of which farmers can not control. The relative importance of yield and acreage differs with different crops. During the last 20 years 95 per cent of the changes in spring-wheat production were due to differences in yields; 83 per cent of winter-wheat production changes and 85 per cent of corn-production differences were likewise caused by yield changes. Corn and wheat, occupying together about half of all the crop land on American farms, thus offer only slight opportunity for the prevention of occasional years of very large crops.

"The remaining major crops—oats, hay, and cotton—are less dependent upon weather conditions, the proportions of variation due to yields being 60 per cent for cotton, 62 per cent for oats, and 47 per cent for hay. As a whole, perhaps three-quarters of the annual variation in crop production is due to yield variations and lies beyond human control through acreage adjustments."

Mr. Hoover says:

"This does not mean that we should ask our farmers to cease production in such commodities (surplus export commodities) and allow their fields to lie idle, but rather that we should explore the possibility of long-view policies making it possible to replace them with commodities which are less dependent upon export competition."

He cites as examples "wool, sugar, vegetable oils, and flax."

In an agricultural surplus-producing nation shifting production from one crop to another can never really stabilize agriculture because of the inability to control production by controlling acreage. Attempts in this direction are usually followed by disaster due to the collapse of markets theretofore profitable. About the only thing accomplished is to shift the distress from one commodity or area, temporarily unprofitable, to other commodities or areas temporarily profitable, which then in turn collapse under the weight of increased production.

HOOVER RECOMMENDATIONS NOT ACCEPTED

Sheep population does not show an increase over pre-war, but, on the contrary, shows a sharp decrease. The average for 1909–1913 was about 53,000,000 head, while the average from 1920–1927, inclusive, has been less than 40,000,000 head, and the 1927 estimate of 42,000,000 head is 20,000,000 head fewer than we had in 1900.

Sugar-beet acreage in 1926 was lower than the average from 1914 to 1920 or from 1921 to 1925.

I think, perhaps, Mr. Hoover can explain, if he will, why the production of sugar beets has not increased more rapidly. Can it be on account of the interests of certain New York financial institutions in the Cuban sugar industry? I am informed that it is. The possibility of beet-sugar development was called to Mr. Hoover's attention some years ago.

Vegetable oils are imported in very large quantities. They are substitutes for cottonseed oil and animal fats. A bitter fight was made against substantial tariffs upon them by certain large industrial interests, and they continue to be imported in enormous quantities.

Has Mr. Hoover ever publicly advocated, before the Tariff Commission or to the President, any increase in tariffs upon these commodities? I can not find that he has.

Flax acreage has shown an increase since the war, but has been decreasing since 1924.

HOOVER'S REAL REMEDY

Now we come to his real remedy. He says:

"Our domestic consumption is increasing faster than our production, and if the American farmer can have this domestic market to himself the law of supply and demand will run entirely in his favor. I feel that we are in a few years within reach of the point when agricultural profits must be relatively so much higher than in recent years that they will warrant cultivation of land more expensive to operate, provided we maintain the policies I have outlined."

This is the policy of "laissez faire," which means, "Let the situation alone; it will cure itself." "Acreage will be starved out." The pamphlet prepared and published by the farm organizations March 28, 1924, to which I have referred, gives their view on this point in no uncertain language. (Exhibit 2.)

The situation will cure itself if the political, economic, and social structure will stand the shock; but it will not.

AGRICULTURAL AND INDUSTRIAL STABILITY

Mr. Hoover says:

"We must have greater stability in this industry (agriculture) if we are to have the stability in other industries and if the Nation as a whole is to make real progress. Moreover, we can not have stability in agriculture unless we have stability in the other branches of commerce and industry."

The farmers have been seeking greater stability of their industry and have been prevented by Mr. Hoover from securing it for more than seven years. As the agricultural advisor of the last two administrations he is more responsible for the continuing depression in agriculture than any other one man in the Nation and, therefore, for the unprecedented bank and commercial failures.

Farmers recognize the necessity of stability in other industries and by refraining so long from attack upon the protective devices erected from within and without Congress for the benefit of other groups, have given substantial evidence of their appreciation of the interdependence of agriculture and other industries and of their obligation to the Nation as citizens.

Industry will do well to follow their example in this respect.

Farmers doubt the wisdom of Mr. Hoover's "long-view" policy which insists on a "laissez faire" attitude toward agriculture. They constitute a market five or six times as great for the products of industry as does the export market. They know that more than 95 per cent of the market for the products of industry is domestic, and they insist that as a matter of self-interest for industry as well as in common justice to them, industry should recognize this fact. They feel that industry should now support them by withdrawing its opposition to a constructive solution of their problem and by so doing, stimulate its own home market.

Mr. Hoover has much to say of the value to the farmer of the home market for his products, but this argument may be overworked when considering our staple crops where the world's price is almost a determining factor in our domestic price. What difference does it make to the wheat grower in Montana or Kansas, for example, if his customer lives in New England or Old England, if his price is the same from both?

The wheat grower sometimes wonders whether, if his eastern customer were not so prosperous, he would not eat more bread and pork and wear cotton clothes instead of eating more expensive foods, such as fruits and vegetables, and wearing silks.

It is a poor rule that does not work both ways.

HOOVER AND PROGRAM FOR ELIMINATION OF WASTE

Mr. Hoover suggests "the elimination of waste in production and distribution not only of what the farmer sells but also what he buys," and refers to the activities of the Department of Commerce in eliminating waste in industry.

He says:

"During the last four years we have held over 200 conferences with those representing various trades and industries. * * * Something over 100 industries and trades are developing actual programs of attainment."

One would think from reading Mr. Hoover's statement that he originated this program of elimination of waste. The truth is it was a continuation in the Department of Commerce of work commenced by manufacturers before we went into war and continued during the war in the Council of National Defense, and later in the War Industries Board.

Much of the saving effected through this program is never passed on to the consumer but is withheld by the industries as long as possible, and that is a long time when "over 100 industries and trades are developing actual programs of attainment" in cooperation with a gigantic Government department.

What has Mr. Hoover done toward eliminating waste by shortening the route of distribution from the manufacturers to the farmer?

This route is obstructed by rules and regulations within the industries.

Many cooperative associations would welcome an opportunity to serve their members by supplying them at a lower price with staple productive materials. Reference is made to such items as fertilizer, coal, lumber, cement, salt, agricultural machinery, etc.

I believe that he has done nothing in this direction but that he has concerned himself more in maintaining the present cumbersome and expensive machinery of distribution in a position of status quo.

There was a virgin field here for his attention which properly belonged to his department and which would have furnished a profitable outlet for his great energy and ability.

I wonder if it would be asking too much if we asked him to take a "long view" in this direction instead of trying to dominate the Department of Agriculture either directly or indirectly through "his man" Jardine.

HOOVER AND INLAND WATERWAYS

Mr. Hoover says:

"Construction of the St. Lawrence, Mississippi, and other waterway systems, the improvement of the Columbia and Colorado Rivers, will contribute in various directions to decreased cost of transportation."

Mr. Hoover has made public addresses in the Middle West advocating inland waterways, attempting to show, among other things, the savings to farmers on shipments of their surplus crops.

The development of the St. Lawrence waterway will take many years, and if, as he says, through increased population domestic demand will catch up with domestic production, or if we are to reduce our production to the demand of the domestic markets, why should the farmer be interested in spending the Government's money to build this waterway for the purpose of saving money on the shipment of a surplus he will not have by the time the waterway is completed, if Mr. Hoover's views on agriculture prevail?

IV

CONCLUSION

Most of the statements made by Mr. Hoover and by his friends on his behalf are so at variance with the facts as disclosed by the record of his actions and are so irrelevant to the condition of agriculture to-day that one wonders if he has been and is now seeking to serve the interests of the farm producers, the interests of dealers in and the exporters and manufacturers of the farmers' products, or his own present political interests.

The belief of the farm leaders with whom I have been associated is that he is now seeking to insinuate himself into favor with the rank and file of the farmers in order to serve his own political interests first and that if successful he will then serve the interests of the exporters, dealers, and manufacturers of the farmers' products; then, as well as his limited vision will permit, the business interests of the Nation, and that finally the farmer may have the crumbs which fall from the rich man's table.

Mr. Hoover may and probably will charge that my motives in making this statement are political and that I favor the candidacy of others for President.

In one way he is right; my motives are now political; but they are nonpartisan. I will go to any legitimate length to save agriculture and the country from such a fraud.

In my opinion any candidate yet mentioned by either party would be supported by the farm population in preference to Hoover, with such a record of duplicity and deliberate exploitation of agriculture.

If Mr. Hoover takes exception to my statements or attempts to refute them, I invite him to join with me now in a request to Congress to make such an investigation as I suggested in 1925, broadening it to include an investigation of statements herein contained. From the report of such an investigation the public can form an accurate opinion as to "his record as a friend of the American farmer" and the wisdom of his "long-view" policies.

EXHIBIT NO. 1

COOPERATIVE MARKETING WILL CURE THE ILLS

Cooperative marketing will help but can not cure the condition. A cooperative handling a commodity consumed in the domestic market can affect the price, but not with full effect with a surplus product. Even if it were possible to herd all the skeptical, the recalcitrant, and the obtuse among 6,000,000 farmers into one great wheat, corn, cotton, swine, or cattle cooperative, and it is utterly impossible to do this in time to do any good, still that great cooperative could produce but little effect on the terminal price of an export crop unless it had precisely the facilities and powers conferred on the proposed corporation by the McNary-Haugen bill. It could not do so because it would not be able to address the cause.

The cause is the surplus, the distressed world, and the tariff. It is an extraneous thing. It can not be reached by efforts here less than the segregation of the surplus from the domestic market.

The bill does not oppose cooperation; it fosters, encourages, and makes cooperation possible. It interferes not at all with the benefits derived from cooperation. By just so much as the cooperatives can secure more equitable grading, reduce the cost of domestic distribution, shorten the road from farm to market can they save for the producer portions of the difference between farm price and terminal price. But without this bill, such is the limit of their power. They can do the things above-mentioned, bill or no bill. But they can do them far better with the bill than without it, and if, during the five years of the bill's emergency existence as a law, they attain to a sufficient unity of purpose and quality of efficiency, they can take over the corporation and live happily ever afterwards.

LAISSEZ FAIRE—LET THE SITUATION ALONE—IT IS VERY BAD, BUT IT WILL CURE ITSELF

This is the Manchester doctrine of "laissez faire." It is sound in its economics. The situation will cure itself by the immutable law of compensation. "Laissez faire" does not, however, follow as a conclusion. Smallpox becomes innocuous to a race if left alone. That is no argument against vaccination. Let us see how the situation could be cured or cure itself. It is due to a combination of two causes—the tariff, raising the American price level above the world price level on all the farmer buys, the surplus, importing the world price level into America for the farmer alone on every crop producing a surplus. Therefore the cures are these:

I. Free trade; give the farmer world prices for what he buys as well as for what he sells.

II. Curing the demoralization of the world and thus raising world prices to the American plane.

III. Elimination of surplus by—

(a) Its destruction as such.

(b) Its consumption at home by a 20 per cent increase in population.

(c) Its segregation as proposed in the bill.

(d) Its avoidance by abandonment of acreage.

There are no other ways save these or the combination of two or more of them. Free trade may be dismissed. No matter how ardent a theoretical free trader might be, he would not, being an equally ardent American, favor a sudden throwing down of the dikes and letting in on our guarded domestic structure the existing depression of a world in chaos—an influx of goods representing a hollow-eyed labor of gaunt Europe, entailing the sudden destruction of American living standard. He would not—at this perilous juncture—toss away for a beautiful theory the relatively happy state of our whole people. Even the bankrupt farmer—his home threatened and the savings of his life already absorbed—does not ask this.

The most bloodless Manchesterian would not counsel the farmer to wait till the world is restored to something approaching normal prosperity. The causes of its depression are too deep, too menacing of further depression. We can omit to consider as a counsel of value the voice that tells the farmer "Wait till the world is restored to pre-war prosperity."

Nor would anyone dare suggest that we burn our surplus or sink it in the seas—not in the presence of the hungry mouths that wail across the world. We are hardly ready to espouse such sabotage on a scale so vast.

It is quite true that the time is well within sight when we shall consume our entire farm surplus at home. At the present rate of increase of population, decreased fertility, soil erosions, and considering the fact that we are already near the limit of practicable productive acreage, that time is perhaps not more than 15 years in the future. But they would be Job's comforters who would sit down at the farmer's barren board and attempt to console him with the thought that all will be well in 15 years.

Now, the "laissez faireians" mean that the situation will cure itself much quicker than in any way yet discussed, by the abandonment of, for example, some 20 per cent of our wheat acreage. It is a pretty theory. It will take, say, five years of continued depression to beat down the sturdy resistance and the grim struggle of owners and tenants of the wheat and corn lands to preserve their homes and the remnants of their fortunes. In five years perhaps only 80 per cent of the fittest will have survived and the surplus will have been starved out. The "fittest" does not refer to the most efficient workers. It refers to the most efficient areas—those nearest to markets and most facile. The wrecked homesteads and deserted villages, the ruined fortunes, and the scattered families proposed by opponents of the bill will not result at once. Five years, at least, will be required. This breed does not quit in the face of adversity. It sticks. Then we shall have to give further years while the indicator needle of domestic demand shivers nervously and begins the upward swing which will restore tenants to those abandoned lands, and so on for five further years, up to the limit of our productive power, when we shall either begin to import these products or widen our own borders.

Is this a counsel of sanity? Build up—destroy—build up—in alternating periods of half decades? Is it not better to use an emergency measure to preserve? For what will happen in these five years of destruction? Are our people a race of yellow-faced economists who will respect this scientific reasoning with stoical indifference behind their horn-rimmed glasses? They are not. They are freckle-necked, hairy-chested fighters. Such powerful forces can crush them but not as one could press the life out of a sick kitten. They will press back. There is a social and political bearing in this economic problem.

We know what repercussion precisely this situation once did bring to the Nation. It brought the bloodiest civil war in the history of the world. Beginning with the South Carolina eruption of nullification, exactly this same subsidy of northern industry by the tariff, and at the expense of the export-producing agricultural South—exactly this was the economic cause of the Civil War, and economic causes are the only real causes of modern war. Would it now result in red revolt? Perhaps not, simply because we have learned the greater effect of more peaceful means. But it will result in something far more objectionable than the McNary-Haugen bill. It is resulting so. We have here an intrinsic inequity, an immoral policy, a great subversive cause bearing bitterly down on one of the sturdiest and most independent segments of our population. That segment is becoming highly articulate. If its grievances receive no mercy at the hands of the sacred two-party system of our political structure, it knows the power of another way and it can, should, and will use that power ruthlessly against oppression. It has tasted the savor of "bloc" control. Washington is being invaded by strange, new faces and voices that compel attention if not delight. A general election is upon us, and, dependent solely on immediate relief of this oppression, hangs the quality of the next Congress and the policy of the next administration. (A political upheaval was averted in 1924 by promises of all political parties to place agriculture upon a basis of equality with industry, promises which still remain unredeemed.) Our business structure would do well to give ear to a measure economically and politically sound, or it may give sections of its smoking flesh to measures which are not so.

There is no argument against the McNary-Haugen bill which can be said to go to its merits. There are only grievances. These grievances are not for wrongs done or threatened. They are for inequitable privileges, accustomed franchises of subsidy and exploitation, now felt to be threatened. They are protests against the cleansing of an unjust condition. They can not prevail because they have no right to prevail, and no man can advocate them without miring himself in a morass of deceits, inconsistencies, and evasions.

"Laissez faire" may be the answer to a proposal to interfere with the working of a natural law in a normal status. But when natural law has already been interfered with by the interposition of artificial controls, such as the tariff, and these artifices create subsidies, oppression, and rank injustice, "laissez faire" of the resulting condition is a counsel of dissolution. We can either abolish the old interference entirely, or we can amend its evil. But we can not leave it alone. We are dealing with an American public of the twentieth century, and not with a French proletariat of the early eighteenth.

If we are to retain the doctrine of protection—and we are—there is only one practicable way to restore justice, and that is to segregate the surplus, sell it abroad, and regulate supply to demand on the domestic market. Such is the McNary-Haugen bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay a vote on the bill, but I had understood that the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] intended to address the Senate at this time.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, yesterday I expressed the hope that to-day might be wholly devoted to the discussion of the unfinished business, the so-called farm relief bill. I am advised, however, by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that he desires to speak on quite another subject this morning. I hope that at the conclusion of his observations we may go forward with the farm bill, as there are three or four Members of the Senate who have expressed a desire to speak to-day. I assume the Senator from Idaho is among that number.

Mr. BORAH. Not necessarily, Mr. President. I simply did not want to be taken by surprise in having the bill come to a vote; that is all. I understood that the Senator from Montana was going to speak or I should not have interrupted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did not clearly understand the Senator from Oregon. Did he say that he hoped for a vote to-day on the McNary-Haugen bill?

Mr. McNARY. Not at all. I stated that there are several Senators who expressed to me their desire to speak on the bill to-day, but that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] had given notice that he was to speak on another subject, and those Senators would probably follow him. I made no reference to a vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply desired to express the hope that the Senator from Oregon would not call for too early action upon the farm relief bill, because I think probably it will be to the advantage of his contention if he will take a little more time and allow us to consider the bill a little more carefully than we have had an opportunity to do up to this time.

Mr. McNARY. It is not my intention to press the bill in such a way that Senators may not be heard. I shall give all Senators an opportunity to prepare their remarks and amendments. The Senator from North Carolina may be assured that he will have full opportunity to study the bill and to speak upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wanted to have an opportunity further to study the bill, and I know of a number of Senators on this side of the Chamber who also desire an opportunity to do so, and to prepare some amendments that might make the bill satisfactory to some of us, to whom in its present shape it is not satisfactory.

Mr. McNARY. I shall follow that advice.

MEMORIAL SERVICES ON THE LATE SENATOR JONES OF NEW MEXICO

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, heretofore an order was entered by the Senate designating Sunday, April 8, as the time for the delivery of memorial addresses on the life and character of the late Senator JONES of New Mexico. That day being Easter Sunday, I now ask that the hour for the memorial services shall be fixed at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of next Sunday, the 8th.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

NAVAL OIL RESERVE LEASES

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise to submit some further observations touching the address the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] made some time ago in the Senate in relation to the leasing of the naval oil reserves, and other matters more or less intimately associated therewith. It was quite impossible for me upon the conclusion of the last speech of the Senator from Indiana to follow all of the charges that were made in his carefully prepared address, which was read. Neither shall I now, having had an opportunity to read the speech in the RECORD, attempt to meet or discuss the multitude of misrepresentations of fact found therein, but shall content myself by referring to enough of them to characterize the entire address.

In his opening speech the Senator from Indiana assailed the distinguished Governor of New York for alleged misconduct in office. The Governor of New York needs no defense from me nor, with respect to charges made against him by the Senator from Indiana, as I think, any defense from any man.

The Governor of New York is an extraordinary man in many particulars. Even calumny has not dared to assert that he is not an honest man. The heinous offense with which he is accused is the appointment of Harry Sinclair as a member of the Racing Commission of New York or of continuing him in that office. The charge that Harry Sinclair contributed to the campaign fund of Governor Smith in the year 1920 stands, so far as my information goes, upon the statement of the Senator from Indiana alone. However that may be, I presume no one would find any particular culpability upon the part of a manager of a campaign in the State of New York in the year 1920 in taking a contribution from Mr. Sinclair if one was offered. However that may be, Mr. President, no one has ventured to charge that there was any venality in that particular matter nor in any other official act of the Governor of the State of New York.

Just exactly what virtue or what lack of virtue is required in a racing commissioner I am not advised; just exactly what his duties and responsibilities are I am unable to say; but the whole thing seems to me, Mr. President, of that character as that it might be described, in the language of the street, as "piffle."

Then, Mr. President, the once Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, is the object of the envenomed shafts of the Senator from Indiana. Mr. McAdoo at the present time is a private citizen. He has exercised the inalienable right of an American citizen to have a choice for President of the United States and he has the hardihood to express that choice. The matter of his accepting employment by Mr. Doheny is very well known to the country.

I have no desire at this time to enter upon any eulogy whatever of Mr. McAdoo, but I merely desire to say that we have heard a great deal recently about the "greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton." I would not detract one iota from the merit, such as it may be, to which the present Secretary of the Treasury is entitled, but he has had an easy task. It was his duty to recommend legislation for the reduction of taxes to get rid of a plethoric condition in the Treasury.

It was the duty of Mr. McAdoo to raise money, to devise means, and recommend plans for the raising of sums by the Federal Government such as theretofore had never been even dreamed of. Moreover, when the Great War broke out and the world's systems of exchange went to smash a burden was thrown upon the Secretary of the Treasury, the like of which no predecessor has had to assume in our time. He was intrusted by act of Congress with the power to swell or reduce the circulating medium to the extent of a billion dollars; and no man has ever even suggested that that grave duty was not discharged with perfect fidelity. Later on he was empowered by the Congress of the United States to loan $10,000,000,000 to our allies, and again the duty was discharged with such faithfulness as that criticism never was voiced in any quarter. His conduct of the Liberty loan campaigns, by which huge sums were poured into the Treasury by the patriotic people of the United States, will be remembered in history to his credit.

But in the last address of the Senator from Indiana I myself was the chief object of his shafts. Mr. President, the lands recovered by the actions brought to cancel the leases of the naval oil reserves executed by Secretary Fall and Secretary Denby are stated by the present Secretary of the Navy to contain approximately a billion barrels of oil. It was in evidence before the Committee on Public Lands that a profit of $1 a barrel might reasonably be expected by anyone equipped to extract and refine and sell petroleum products. Accordingly, the Government of the United States recovered by these proceedings lands of approximately the value of a billion dollars. The press of the country has been kind enough to give me credit to some extent and to some degree for that result.

If the stockholders of a corporation should employ an attorney to recover property corruptly or fraudulently conveyed away by the directors of the company and a recovery should be had, the court would allow the complainant suing on behalf of himself as well as other stockholders an attorney's fee commensurate with the labors involved and the value of the property recovered. If I should be thus employed and should succeed as well as was the case here, the court would probably make allowance for attorney's fees that would make me richer than I ever expected to be or hoped to be or desired to be. But I have been very much more amply repaid and better repaid by, as I think, the gratitude of the American people, which the Senator from Indiana would like now to snatch away from me.

Mr. President, I think the general character of the address by the Senator from Indiana made the other day can be gathered from the comment found toward the close of his address on page 5542 of the RECORD, as follows:

> The Federal court for the district of Wyoming, in the course of the litigation over the Sinclair leases in Teapot Dome, appointed receivers for the property leased pending the final action of the litigation. These receivers have made their report, which is to the effect that the drainage of the private wells immediately outside Teapot Dome, 150 of which were drilled by virtue of leases given them by the Democratic Secretary of the Interior, have drained the naval reserves of 50,000,000 barrels of petroleum. These gentlemen, who pose as being in possession of righteous leases, are getting the cream of the naval resources. Why, the report of the receivers shows the properties illegally and fraudulently leased to Sinclair are of infinitely less value than they were when Sinclair obtained them. The report shows that the daily crude-oil production of the Sinclair properties has dwindled from 3,700 barrels to 600 barrels, due to the drainage in the private wells just outside the naval reserve. My authority for this is a report of the receivers made to the Federal court for the district of Wyoming, January 11, this year, and contained in a special dispatch from Cheyenne, Wyo., to the New York Times, appearing in that paper the morning of January 12. Fifty million barrels of petroleum is a pretty liberal honorarium for the Democratic Secretary of the Interior to hand out to a Democratic committeeman and others at the head of private oil interests.

The last sentence, Mr. President, I shall return to presently; but I call attention particularly to the information given to the Senate in the extract from which I have just read that under the report of the receivers it appears that the Teapot Dome has been drained of 50,000,000 barrels of oil by the wells in the Salt Creek field.

That is not true; and, what is more, the untruth of it is disclosed by the New York Times, which the Senator from Indiana gives as his authority. I have here the article from the New York Times of Thursday, January 12, 1928. The headlines are as follows:

ASSERTS OUTSIDERS DRAIN TEAPOT DOME—RECEIVER FOR SINCLAIR FILES REPORT THAT GOVERNMENT HAS LOST $60,000,000 TO DATE—ASSAILS EXPERT ESTIMATES—CALLS 50,000,000 BARRELS IN RESERVE A MYTH—NAVAL CORECEIVER DOES NOT CONCUR

(Special to the New York Times)

The article:

CHEYENNE, WYO., January 11.—The Teapot Dome naval oil reserve is pictured as a "political orphan" that has been drained by wells in the adjoining Salt Creek field and is virtually valueless as a source of oil for the Navy in a special report filed in the Federal court for Wyoming by Albert E. Watts, who represented the Harry F. Sinclair interests as a receiver during the litigation which resulted in the return of the reserve to the Government on the ground that the lease was tainted with fraud.

Watts served as receiver with Commander H. A. Stuart, of the Navy. If his conclusions are correct, drainage has cost the Government more than $60,000,000, and is continuing.

Fifty millions of barrels of petroleum estimated by the Government experts to have been contained by the first Wall Creek sand under the reserve are missing, Watts's report relates, and infers that it is obvious that this petroleum was drained away by privately owned wells in the Salt Creek field.

I read further:

Watts's special report is supplemental to the main report. In the latter he and the coreceiver, Captain Stuart, were in agreement.

I ask that the entire article be incorporated in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The facts about the matter are set forth in a letter addressed to me by Captain Stuart, which I send to the desk and ask to have read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 2, 1928.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I am in receipt of your letter of March 31, 1928, in which you ask me to comment on the following extract from a speech delivered in the Senate on March 29 by Senator ROBINSON of Indiana:

"The Federal Court for the District of Wyoming, in the course of the litigation over the Sinclair leases in Teapot Dome, appointed receivers for the property leased pending the final action of the litigation. These receivers have made their report, which is to the effect that the drainage of the private wells immediately outside Teapot Dome, 150 of which were drilled by virtue of leases given them by the Democratic Secretary of the Interior, have drained the naval reserves of 50,000,000 barrels of petroleum. These gentlemen, who pose as being in possession of righteous leases, are getting the cream of the naval resources. Why, the report of the receivers shows the properties, illegally and fraudulently leased to Sinclair, are of infinitely less value than they were when Sinclair obtained them. The report shows that the daily crude-oil production of the Sinclair properties has dwindled from 3,700 barrels to 600 barrels, due to the drainage in the private wells just outside the naval reserve. My authority for this is a report of the receivers made to the Federal Court for the District of Wyoming, January 11, this year, and contained in a special dispatch from Cheyenne, Wyo., to the New York Times, appearing in that paper the morning of January 12. Fifty million barrels of petroleum is a pretty liberal honorarium for the Democratic Secretary of the Interior to hand out to a Democratic committeeman and others at the head of private oil interests."

Permit me to say that neither on January 7, 1928, the date that the receivership on the Teapot Dome naval reserve terminated, nor at any other time during the receivership, covering a period of about four years, did the receivers make any such report as above quoted. I know whereof I speak, because I was one of the two receivers on January 7, 1928, and for a period of about 38 months prior thereto, and assistant to the Government receiver for practically all of the remaining period of the receivership.

While his speech does not say so, Senator ROBINSON undoubtedly refers to the special report of my coreceiver, Mr. Albert E. Watts, a vice president of the Sinclair Consolidated Oil Corporation. On the date that the receivership closed Mr. Watts requested and was granted permission by the court to file a separate report. This he proceeded to do in a very heartfelt and facetious swan song. I did not, and do not now, indorse any of this report, particularly the intimation that there has been a drainage of 50,000,000 barrels of oil from the Teapot Dome by wells in the Salt Creek field. The inference to be drawn from Mr. Watts's report is that all of the 50,000,000 barrels of oil which were supposed to be in what is known as the first Wall Creek sand of the Teapot Dome had been drained out by wells in the Salt Creek field. Suffice it to say that there is no first Wall Creek sand well in the Salt Creek field within about 3½ miles of the Teapot Dome reserve, and even the nearest of these wells is decidedly north of what is known as the "tight-sand" area, in which comparatively few wells of any character have been sunk, owing to its unproductivity.

No report of the receivers shows that "the daily crude-oil production of the Sinclair properties has dwindled from 3,700 barrels to 600 barrels, due to the drainage in the private wells outside the naval reserve." Mr. Watts, in his special report, did make the statement that "under the program followed by the receivers this daily production (3,700 barrels) has decreased to about 600 barrels per day at the closing of the receivership." This decrease, however, was due primarily to the fact that only two new wells were drilled during receivership and can be considered a normal decrease. However, Mr. Watts was incorrect in his statement with reference to 600 barrels; he should have said, in order to be accurate, 700 barrels. Even this quantity would be too low if the reserve had been operating normally. As it was, preparations were being made to close down the reserve, and this caused a falling off in production.

For the month of November, 1927, the average daily production was 800 barrels; and for the last six months of the year 1927, 820 barrels daily.

There are numerous other statements by Mr. Watts in his special report in which I do not concur; and, while the court gave me permission to reply thereto, I could see no point in prolonging a controversy which had been conclusively and justly settled by the United States Supreme Court decision of October 10, 1927. I considered Mr. Watts's report mainly as the wail of an unsuccessful and disappointed litigant, put out primarily for the purpose of propaganda. As evidence of this the report was printed in full—some six columns of it—in one of the Casper papers which is notoriously sympathetic to the Sinclair interests, and extracts from the report were printed rather generously throughout the country.

Mr. Watts's report was dated January 7, 1928, and not January 11, 1928, the receivership having terminated on January 7, 1928.

The above quotation from Senator ROBINSON's speech further states that his authority for making the statement concerning the receivers' report is "a special dispatch from Cheyenne, Wyo., to the New York Times, appearing in that paper the morning of January 12." Presumably, he refers to the article in columns 2 and 3, page 5, of that paper. This article reads as follows:

"Asserts outsiders drain Teapot Dome. Receiver for Sinclair files report that Government has lost $60,000,000 to date. Assails expert estimates. Calls 50,000,000 barrels in reserve a myth—naval coreceiver does not concur."

The article then goes on to expound the views of Mr. "Albert E. Watts, who represented the Harry F. Sinclair interests as a receiver," etc. Both the headlines and the article proper state that the report is a special report by Mr. Watts, a Sinclair repesentative, and not a report by "the receivers."

Yours very truly,

H. A. STUART,
Captain, United States Navy, late coreceiver, operating oil and gas lease on Naval Reserve No. 3.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
United States Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Who is the author of the letter just read and what is his relationship to the litigation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The letter is written by Capt. H. A. Stuart, of the Navy. Captain Stuart was one of the officers of the Navy who from the beginning raised his voice with Commander Shafroth and Captain Halligan against the leasing of the naval oil reserves. By reason of his fidelity in that regard he was designated by the Navy Department to act as one of the receivers of the Teapot Dome property pending the litigation over the cancellation of the oil leases.

Mr. President, the offenses charged against me by the Senator from Indiana are two in number, apparently—first, that I was a member of a conspiracy to turn over the naval oil reserves, or at least the oil public lands, to corrupt interests; and second, that I urged the Senate to pay some attention to testimony given by Mr. Doheny that reserves, or some of them, were likely to be drained by wells on private lands either adjacent to reserves or within the reserves.

As to the conspiracy which the Senator asserts took form and shape immediately upon the Democrats coming into charge of the Government in 1913, it was a conspiracy, as I understand the position of the Senator, for anybody to endeavor to provide for the appropriation or disposition of those lands, running into the tens of millions of acres out in the West, believed to contain coal, oil, sodium, potash, and phosphates, for the bill which was introduced dealing with lands of that character covered all of these mineral substances; and the mere fact that Democratic officials undertook to frame a law for the disposition of lands of that character, which the previous Republican administration had been endeavoring to deal with, is sufficient justification for denouncing that effort as a conspiracy.

A conspiracy is defined in the law as a combination of persons either for the purpose of accomplishing an unlawful object, or a lawful object by unlawful means.

I want to offer for the RECORD here the original bill for the leasing of lands of this character, introduced by myself on March 16, 1914, and I ask that it be made an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I challenge any Senator to point out what there is in this bill which gives rise to any suggestion that there was any conspiracy, or purpose, even, to get these lands into the hands of corrupt interests.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think my charge was, in the statement made the other day, that there was a conspiracy of private oil interests to bring about this very condition which has come about, aided and abetted, perhaps, by high Democratic officials in the last administration, and by the leaders in both Houses of Congress.

Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's challenge just now to find anything in the bill introduced in 1914 to which exception could be taken, I would only use the Senator's own words on September 3, 1919, on this floor, when the Senator from Montana said, in answer to the charge of the late Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin, that this was in the interest of the interests, naming the Standard Oil Co. and others, that he had introduced a bill as early as 1913 or 1914 similar in most respects to this bill. That bill went into the question evidently of oil, because the bill passed February 25, 1920, is the leasing bill we are discussing at this time, which provides, among other things, for the leasing of wells even in the naval reserves 1, 2, and 3.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is repeating a part of his speech, but I answer his remark made upon interrupting me as follows. I quote from the speech:

> Thus the record shows that the conspiracy of private interests to grab the oil within the naval reserves of the Nation was entered into and consummated long before the Republican National Convention of 1920—entered into and consummated with the active aid and assistance of Democratic Cabinet officers and Democratic leaders in both branches of Congress.

It will be observed, Mr. President, from this bill that it has not a thing on earth to do with the naval oil reserves. Indeed, the first paragraph of the bill expressly provides:

> That deposits of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, or sodium in land owned by the United States and not otherwise reserved shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided by this act to citizens of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. May I ask the Senator when the naval reserves were set aside?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They were withdrawn from entry in 1909 and 1910, so that they were not subject to disposition under this act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But when were they set aside as reserves? That is the question I am asking.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The naval reserves Nos. 1 and 2, my recollection is, were set aside by order of President Taft in 1912.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Was there not an order of President Wilson and of the Secretary of the Navy, or at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy, setting aside these same reserves, 1, 2, and 3, for purposes of the Navy?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was not. My recollection is President Wilson in 1919 set aside the oil-shale reserves.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In the Senator's bill, which he introduced in 1914, was there any mention made of the naval reserves that had been set aside?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am going only by the Senator's own statement that he introduced a bill in 1913 or 1914, as he recalled it on that day, which was very similar to the bill then under discussion, in 1919, which was finally passed on February 25, 1920, and at that time, the Senator will not deny, there was some provision with reference to the naval reserves.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will call attention to what there is about the naval reserves there. I am talking now about the charge of the Senator that as soon as the Democratic administration got in, it entered into a conspiracy with private interests to grab the naval oil reserves.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the charge was made by the late Senator La Follette that the oil interests were all around here and were in a conspiracy. If I remember rightly, he used that language, although he might not have used that word. That was certainly the substance and the meaning conveyed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator having referred to my remarks, I quote as he quoted them:

> The genesis of this bill goes back to a bill which was introduced in 1913 or 1914, it being in all essential particulars like this, although, of course, differing some in details. That bill was introduced by myself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That was the language of the Senator himself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; of course, it was the language of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And I assumed the Senator meant just what he said, that it was in all respects similar to the bill which was just then being discussed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Differing in detail.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And in discussing that bill, which was before the Senate on September 3, 1919, the Senator did argue in favor of leasing the oil in the reserves themselves.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator argued in favor of making provision so that wells outside should not drain the oil from inside the reserves.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But to do that the wells that were in the reserves would be leased to private interests.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Wells should be leased so far as was necessary to protect the reserves.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the Senator used as one of his authorities on that occasion Mr. Phelan.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; the Senator has told us so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator used Mr. Phelan.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator used as his authority Mr. Phelan, who was the oil expert for the Shipping Board, and he used Mr. Doheny, a man experienced in the oil business; and the Senator from Montana believed that the statements of those two gentlemen with respect to the matter were entitled to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the Senator so stated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And the Senator so stated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And that the committee had made no mistake in incorporating that provision in the measure which provided for the leasing of the oil reserves.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no; they did not incorporate any such provision in the bill. I shall call attention to the provision in the bill. The bill made no provision for the leasing of the reserves. I will tell the Senator presently just what it did provide with respect to that.

Mr. President, not only did this bill which I introduced on March 16, 1914, expressly exclude the naval oil reserves and all other reserves and deal only with the general public lands, but it contained no provision whatever like section 17, section 18, and section 18-a of the act that was finally passed, which has provoked the animadversions of the Senator from Indiana. It did provide as follows:

> SEC. 20. That no person, association, or corporation, except as herein provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest, as a stockholder or otherwise, in more than one lease of each of the deposits herein named and described, during the life of such lease, and any interest held in violation of this provision shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction, except that any such ownership or interest hereby forbidden, which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree, may be held for two years and not longer after its acquisition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, did not the Senator on that occasion use these words, after referring to Mr. Doheny, and having referred immediately before that to Mr. Phelan:

> In this situation of affairs, Mr. President, it occurs to me that the committee have acted wisely in providing that the wells already upon the reserves should be leased and that the President should have the authority to direct the drilling of other wells whenever, in his judgment, it becomes necessary to subserve the public interest. I do not believe, therefore, that those provisions of this bill are open to any serious objection.

This in response to the late Senator La Follette's objection that the bill was written in the interest of the interests.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so; but does the Senator find anything there to show that I advocated the leasing of the reserves?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Only what the Senator said himself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, of course; what the Senator said himself was that the wells there should be leased.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And new ones opened up if necessary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not care to follow that further.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, it is perfectly clear to everybody except the Senator from Indiana that the object of the suggestion of the Senator from Montana was to conserve the Government interests by preventing the draining of oils in the reserves by wells outside the reserves.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It would not occur to the mind of any other living person who has read that statement, and the statements with it, than the mind of the Senator from Indiana, that there was any suspicious purpose connected with the suggestion which he quoted as having been made by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The remarks made by me and quoted by the Senator from Indiana bear honestly no such interpretation as that I ever advocated the leasing of the naval oil reserves.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will yield for just an observation in answer to the Senator from Arkansas, it is perfectly proper to say that evidently the Senator had in mind conserving oil in the reserves from being drained by wells just outside, but this leasing act provided for turning over the wells outside the reserves to people who were called trespassers by the late Senator from Wisconsin, and some of them had even signed papers to get the titles believing they were election warrants, or something of that kind, and that is openly charged here; and then they were ultimately turned over to the large interests.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, not only was the provision to which I have just called attention found in the original bill, but reference has been made to the fact that Senator La Follette expressed some apprehension that the lands would pass into the control of great monopolies and trusts. However, the act as passed undertook to provide for that situation of affairs in section 27, which reads as follows:

> SEC. 27. That no person, association, or corporation, except as herein provided, shall take or hold more than one coal, phosphate, or sodium lease during the life of such lease in any one State; no person, association, or corporation shall take or hold, at one time, more than three oil or gas leases granted hereunder in any one State, and not more than one lease within the geologic structure of the same producing oil or gas field; no corporation shall hold any interest as a stockholder of another corporation in more than such number of leases; and no person or corporation shall take or hold any interest or interests as a member of an association or associations or as a stockholder of a corporation or corporations holding a lease under the provisions hereof, which, together with the area embraced in any direct holding of a lease under this act, or which, together with any other interest or interests as a member of an association or associations or as a stockholder of a corporation or corporations holding a lease under the provisions hereof, for any kind of mineral leased hereunder, exceeds in the aggregate an amount equivalent to the maximum number of acres of the respective kinds of minerals allowed to any one lessee under this act. Any interests held in violation of this act shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in the United States district court for the district in which the property, or some part thereof, is located, except that any ownership or interest forbidden in this act which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for two years and not longer after its acquisition.

It will be seen that thus far the act follows pretty much the original law. It continues:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit sections 18, 18a, 19, and 22 or to prevent any number of lessees under the provisions of this act from combining their several interests so far as may be necessary for the purposes of constructing and carrying on the business of a refinery, or of establishing and constructing as a common carrier a pipe line or lines of railroads to be operated and used by them jointly in the transportation of oil from their several wells, or from the wells of other lessees under this act, or the transportation of coal: Provided further, That any combination for such purpose or purposes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior on application to him for permission to form the same: And provided further, That if any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of, or are in anywise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, or sodium entered into by the lessee, or any agreement or understanding, written, verbal, or otherwise to which such lessee shall be a party, of which his or its output is to be or become the subject, to control the price or prices thereof or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of the amounts of lands provided in this act, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

While Senator La Follette had some misgivings about the bill in its earlier stages, when it was perfected and ready for passage he expressed quite a different view about it.

I called attention heretofore to some similar expressions from former Senator Kenyon, of Iowa, as the bill was about to be put on its final passage, when I rose and asked that final action upon the bill be deferred until Senator Kenyon had an opportunity to point out any particulars in the bill which in his judgment might permit such a result as that and to offer any amendment that might occur to him to obviate such result.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment. He did not make any suggestion and he did not offer anything in support of any doubt that he might have concerning the measure, and apparently whatever doubt Senator La Follette had was very largely dissipated as well. I read from page 4251, as follows:

Let me add, Mr. President, while I am on my feet, that my only purpose in making that suggestion now is in order that time may be given to the consideration of the bill that might otherwise be taken up by the call of the roll and in other ways. I think great progress has been made in the consideration of this subject, and that we have before us a bill here that gives promise of legislation at this session. This bill is a wide departure from the position taken by the advocates of the legislation at the conclusion of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and I am encouraged by the improvement which has been made during the time since March in the direction of a better protection of the public interests over the measure that was presented at that time by the committee, the personnel of which is almost entirely the same as it was then—I think there are only four new members upon the committee—to hope that a day or two more given to the consideration of this measure may work out some further improvements.

I wish to commend the committee for the excellent provisions the bill contains.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me at this point?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Indiana insisted that some of the services rendered by the Senator from Montana might not have been approved. Let me read from a speech delivered in the Senate of the United States on February 11, 1924, by the late Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. La Follette, sr., adverting to the services in this very matter rendered by the senior Senator from Montana. The Senator from Wisconsin was speaking upon the resolution requesting the President to ask for the resignation of Secretary of the Navy Denby. The Senator from Wisconsin said:

In order that I might keep within compass upon a subject which tempts me to extended discussion, I have reduced to manuscript all that I have to say, and shall follow my prepared remarks, unless in a way compelled to make digression.

Mr. President, before I discuss the pending resolution I wish to say a word in commendation of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] for the great public service he has performed in conducting the investigation into the entire subject of the leasing of our naval oil reserves.

This investigation has taken a full year of time and of his energy. He has conducted it under conditions of great difficulty and against obstacles which must at times have seemed almost insuperable. It has made heavy inroads upon his strength and health and has demanded the sacrifice of all other interests.

It may well be that the widespread ramifications of the scandal which has been recently unearthed largely through the efforts of the senior Senator from Montana may impose upon him too heavy a burden. He must not be hampered by lack of capable and trustworthy assistants.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, with reference to the charge made that the policy of leasing the naval oil reserves did not originate with Mr. Fall and his associates, but had its origin before they came into control and was initiated by Democratic officials of the Government, let me say this.

But before I pass to that I want to refer to the press report of a statement made recently by ex-Secretary Fall or given in the deposition that was taken at his home in El Paso recently, to the effect that there was not even anything new about the order of the President by which the administration of the naval oil reserve was turned over to the Department of the Interior and taken out of the custody of the Secretary of the Navy, where it was placed by the act of Congress.

That seemed to me so startling a statement—quite in line, however, with the argument of the Senator from Indiana—that I called up Mr. Finney and asked him what the facts about the matter are. I have the following letter from him, which I ask the clerk to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 3, 1928.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Referring to your inquiry over the phone of this afternoon, I have to advise you that I do not know of any order signed by former President Wilson transferring jurisdiction of any or all naval reserves from the Secretary of the Navy to the Secretary of the Interior. There was submitted to President Wilson by Hon. John Barton Payne, then Secretary of the Interior, on February 16, 1921, a recommendation that 120 acres in section 28, in naval reserve No. 2, be leased under section 18 or section 18a of the leasing act of February 25, 1920, to the Consolidated Mutual Oil Co. et al., claiming under mining locations. It was stated in the letter that the Secretary of the Interior thought the entire section should be leased because of conditions set forth, but that the Secretary of the Navy would only agree to leasing 120 acres. This recommendation was approved by President Wilson. See page 222, volume 1, hearings before the Public Land and Surveys Committee, United States Senate (1924); see also pages 3185–3186, volume 3 of the same publication.

Very truly yours,

E. C. FINNEY,
First Assistant Secretary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In order to understand the baselessness of the charge to which I am now directing the attention of the Senate, attention must be given to the provisions of the leasing law. I refer now to the act of February 25, 1920, and not the act of June 4, 1920, under which the so-called naval oil leases were executed. That law, dealing, as I have indicated, with the general public lands and not specifically with the lands within the naval oil reserve, contemplated that prospectors might go out on the general public domain in regions where they thought oil might be found, but where the existence of oil had not been demonstrated at all, and there prospect for oil. Under the act a prospecting permit could be given for an area not to exceed 2,560 acres. If oil were found by a prospector he could then have a lease of one-fourth of the area within his prospecting permit, paying therefor a royalty of 12½ per cent, and the remainder of the land within his prospecting permit and within the same geological structure where it had been demonstrated that oil would be found could be leased in limited areas by public auction to the highest bidder. I read the provisions in relation to leases within areas known to be valuable for the oil contained within them:

"SEC. 17. That all unappropriated deposits of oil or gas situated within the known geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field and the unentered lands containing the same, not subject to preferential lease, may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior to the highest responsible bidder by competitive bidding under general regulations to qualified applicants in areas not exceeding 640 acres and in tracts which shall not exceed in length two and one-half times their width, such leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such bonus as may be accepted and of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease, which shall not be less than 12½ per cent in amount or value of the production, and the payment in advance of a rental of not less than $1 per acre per annum thereafter during the continuance of the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

That is to say, Mr. President, whenever oil was discovered in a certain field the lands within that geological structure, naturally supposed to contain oil just the same as the area within which it was found, should be offered for leasing to the highest bidder after public advertisement at public auction.

There was another provision in the law which needs attention. Under the provisions of then existing law prospectors had gone out upon the public domain and had been conducting operations upon what is called wildcat territory with a view to the discovery of oil.

I might say that prior to the enactment of this legislation and prior to the withdrawal of these great areas oil land could be appropriated under what is known as the placer mining law. That law, when it was enacted, contemplated the appropriation of lands valuable for the placer mineral contents. The gold prospector would go out in the hills, follow the bed of a stream, encounter auriferous sands there, and, panning the sand, would find gold. That would be his first act—that is, he made his discovery—he found gold. Whereupon he marked out a certain area allowed to him by the law and he eventually became entitled to a patent to that particular ground. That act was equally applicable to the appropriation of oil lands, but it was regarded upon all hands as entirely inappropriate to the purpose, and therefore this new legislation was demanded by a powerful public sentiment and a perfectly justifiable public sentiment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, right there, if the Senator from Montana will yield, I desire to ask, Was there not a tremendous public sentiment against it in the various States, as evidenced by the many telegrams and communications put into the RECORD?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was a powerful public sentiment in the West against any leasing law, the people there insisting that the old law which gave a title in fee should be continued in some form. That was the position in the West.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As a matter of fact, it was charged on this floor, was it not, I will ask the Senator from Montana, and so far as I know not successfully denied, that there were any number of trespassers on those public lands outside of the oil reserves who would be given prior rights under this legislation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am just going to tell about those trespasses. There were no trespassers at all. The law granted to every citizen of the United States the right to go upon the public lands and to appropriate those lands as the law provided. Accordingly, a large number of persons went upon those lands and tried to discover oil on them, just as they had tried to discover gold on them; just the same as they had tried to discover silver upon them or copper or cinnabar and lead and other metals and mineral substances. It takes a long time to get down to where the oil is, and so they reversed the process ordinarily followed and marked out an area of ground, in the first place 20 acres allowed under the placer mining law, and then proceeded to drill, but the prospector had no right to that particular land at all until he struck oil, although he was entitled to occupy the ground for the purpose of doing prospecting. When this act was passed, many of those people had gone to great expense. They had been obliged to bring machinery in to do the work; they had been obliged to build roads; they had been obliged to bring in water for the purpose of conducting their operations; they had to bring in supplies of various kinds; and these expenditures had to be met, although they had not yet discovered oil. So it was provided in section 18 of the law that in such cases persons who had thus occupied tracts of land under the existing laws, with a view to finding oil upon them, and had made expenditures, would be entitled to a preference in the lease of those particular lands. That was provided in section 18.

Now, I desire to say that the bill that I introduced had nothing to do with that question. There is no provision in the bill I introduced that has any relation to section 18 incorporated here; and yet I am not prepared to say that some provision ought not to have been made for those people. Section 18 reads as follows:

That upon relinquishment to the United States, filed in the General Land Office within six months after the approval of this act, of all right, title, and interest claimed and possessed prior to July 3, 1910, and continuously since by the claimant or his predecessor in interest under the preexisting placer mining law to any oil or gas bearing land upon which there has been drilled one or more oil or gas wells to discovery embraced in the Executive order of withdrawal issued September 27, 1909, and not within any naval petroleum reserve—and upon payment as royalty to the United States of an amount equal to the value at the time of production of one-eighth of all the oil or gas already produced except oil or gas used for production purposes on the claim, or unavoidably lost, from such land, the claimant, or his successor, if in possession of such land, undisputed by any other claimant prior to July 1, 1919, shall be entitled to a lease thereon from the United States for a period of 20 years, at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent of all the oil or gas produced except oil or gas used for production purposes on the claim, or unavoidably lost: Provided, That not more than one-half of the area, but in no case to exceed 3,200 acres, within the geologic oil or gas structure of a producing oil or gas field shall be leased to any one claimant under the provision of this section when the area of such geologic oil structure exceeds 640 acres. Any claimant or his successor, subject to this limitation, shall, however, have the right to select and receive the lease as in this section provided for that portion of his claim or claims equal to, but not in excess of, said one-half of the area of such geologic oil structure, but not more than 3,200 acres.

All such leases shall be made and the amount of royalty to be paid for oil and gas produced, except oil or gas used for production purposes on the claim, or unavoidably lost, after the execution of such lease shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations: Provided, however, That as to all like claims situate within any naval petroleum reserve the producing wells thereon only shall be leased, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, upon the terms and payment of royalties for past and future production as herein provided for in the leasing of claims. No wells shall be drilled in the land subject to this provision within 660 feet of any such leased well without the consent of the lessee: Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, lease the remainder or any part of any such claim upon which such wells have been drilled, and in the event of such leasing such claimant or his successor shall have a preference right to such lease.

That is as far as is necessary to read in order to make clear what I have to say about it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question right there, if I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEPHENS in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The late Senator La Follette offered an amendment to strike out section 18 of the bill. Is not that true?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have been looking over the RECORD, but I have been unable to find any such amendment. I dare say, however, that that is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the Senator from Montana did vote against the amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know anything about that; but it is a little late now to talk about a bill that was passed here in 1920. However, Mr. President, I wish to say this much, that the RECORD discloses that the bill as it was finally framed was so unobjectionable to every Member of the Senate that it passed without even a roll call. Not only upon the final passage of the bill, but upon the conference report as well, there was no roll call.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. So was the amendment on June 4 agreed to without a roll call.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; so was the amendment on June 4; and I desire to say, Mr. President, that there were then in the Senate men as regardful of the public interests as the Senator from Indiana ever will be.

The vote on the conference report is reported at page 2742 of the RECORD of February 11, 1920. The conference report was signed by—

REED SMOOT, I. L. Lenroot, H. L. Myers, and KEY PITTMAN, managers on the part of the Senate.

N. J. SINNOTT, ADDISON T. SMITH, J. A. Elston, and EDWARD T. TAYLOR, managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to. .

In exactly the same way, Mr. President, the bill passed originally without a voice being raised in opposition; but now, after eight years, the Senator from Indiana comes here and assails the bill as a conspiracy between Democratic officials and predatory oil interests.

Mr. President, having this matter in mind——

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, does the Senator know how the Senators from Indiana voted on that bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was no vote, and so, of course, they voted for it; that is, they must be regarded as having voted for it.

Mr. President, the charge that Democratic officials conspired to turn over the naval oil reserves to corrupt interests is not at all new with the Senator from Indiana. In the midst of the hearings conducted four years ago the Republican National Committee sought to convey that idea to the public, as will appear from the RECORD of February 25, 1924, at page 3046. I read as follows:

NAVAL OIL LAND LEASES—PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I call attention to an article appearing in the Washington Post this morning, being an Associated Press dispatch with appropriate headings, as follows:

LAW COVERING NAVAL OIL RESERVE LEASES CREDITED TO WALSH—SENATOR'S "BOAST" CITED BY THE REPUBLICAN COMMITTEE—DRIVE ON DAUGHERTY TO BE RENEWED TO-DAY—WHEELER TO MODIFY RESOLUTION IN REGARD TO NAMING OF INVESTIGATORS

(By the Associated Press)

The news bureau of the Republican National Committee issued a statement yesterday declaring the act which gives the Secretaries of the Navy and Interior the power to lease public oil reserves was fathered by Senator WALSH (Democrat) of Montana. That section under which Secretary Denby acted in signing the Doheny and Sinclair leases, the statement said, was written by former Secretary Josephus Daniels.

Speaking of the policies with respect to leasing, the statement said if there was anything wrong with them the blame should fall on Senator WALSH and Mr. Daniels.

"The leasing act received its first application"—

"under the administration of Josephus Daniels and John Barton Payne, of the Navy and Interior Departments, respectively. Under their administration Government oil lands, both within and without the naval oil reserves, were leased to private interests, to be developed by them on a royalty basis."

POLICIES CREDITED TO WALSH

Senator WALSH, the statement said, in a debate on the leasing act, "boasted of the fact that he was the originator of the policy of leasing public oil lands to private interests." Secretary Daniels, it said, told Chairman BUTLER, of the House Naval Committee, that private interests were draining oil from under Government lands and obtained enactment of the section under which Secretary Denby acted, on the grounds that the Navy must protect its supply.

Under provisions of the law, the statement continued, Secretaries Daniels and Payne leased oil wells in naval reserves. Mr. Payne, it said, approved approximately 150 leases for private interests to develop and operate over 14,000 acres of oil land immediately adjacent to Teapot Dome.

That is the end of the article appearing in the Washington Post. Then I remarked:

I have before me a copy of the article issued by the news bureau of the Republican National Committee to which the Associated Press dispatch referred. This story did not originate with the Republican National Committee. It originated with a Republican paper printed in my home town, and they repeat the misrepresentation made by that paper, which asserted that the leases that had been the subject of inquiry were made under the provisions of the general leasing law approved February 25, 1920, and that I was instrumental in procuring the enactment of that law. They cited at length the debate upon one feature of that law as showing my responsibility for the enactment of the law under which the leases were made.

My attention having been called to the article, I wired to that particular paper the information that the leases were not made under the provisions of the act of February 25, 1920, at all, but were made under the provisions of the act of June 4, 1920; that they were not made under the provisions of the general leasing law at all, but were made under the provision of the naval appropriation act of that year. I said in the telegram that the paper had doubtless been inadvertently led into a mistake with respect to the matter.

I can not, however, give to the Republican National Committee or its news bureau the excuse of having been led into any inadvertent mistake. The misrepresentation on their part is perfectly deliberate and malicious, as everyone in the Senate knows who knows the facts. No one here who has had any part in the debate or who has listened to it has any kind of an idea that the leases under consideration were made under the provisions of the general leasing law but knows that they were made under the provisions of the act of June 4, 1920, which provoked no discussion whatever upon the floor of the Senate and had consideration only in connection with certain amendments that were offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and that were accepted without any debate whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say in this connection that those amendments were sent to me, as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, by the department itself. They were department amendments. So far as the leasing act of February 25, 1920, is concerned, I was chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys that had the leasing bill in charge. I was a member of the conference. There was no question about the passage of that act. I believe it was unanimously agreed to by both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is referring to the act of June 4, 1920?

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the leasing act.

Then, Mr. President, I challenged any Member of the Senate on either side of the Chamber to rise in his place and correct any misstatement of fact that I made in respect to the matter, and both the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Lenroot, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] rose in their places and said that the statement I made was substantially correct.

But, Mr. President, as I say, this is old stuff. The effort of the Republican National Committee, made in 1924, to broadcast through this country and impress the public mind with the soundness of the charges now made by the Senator from Indiana fell flat. Of course the public was not imposed upon by any such representations; but another effort was made in that direction and matter put in the RECORD which I dare say is the source of most of the information or misinformation given to the Senate by the Senator from Indiana.

It will be remembered that when the hearings before the Public Lands Committee upon this subject first began, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was the chairman of the committee. He was promoted to the position of chairman of the Finance Committee upon the incoming of Congress in the month of December, 1924; and his place as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands was taken by Senator Lenroot, of Wisconsin, then the ranking member of the committee. Senator Lenroot's health failed him, however, at a later stage of the proceedings and he was succeeded by Senator Ladd, of North Dakota. Senator Lenroot resigned not only as chairman of the committee but also as a member of the committee, and his place was taken by Senator Spencer, of Missouri.

Senator Spencer, in an effort to relieve the Republican Party and its managers from some share of the odium which had been cast upon them by these transactions, caused to be introduced in the record a list of some 20 questions and answers which he asserted had been sent by Secretary Denby to the Chairman of the House Naval Affairs Committee, the purpose of which was again to establish that the policy of leasing the naval oil reserves originated with the Democratic administration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the Senator does not deny that charge, does he—that the policy began in the Democratic administration?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of leasing the naval oil reserves?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes. The Senator does not deny the fact that Secretary Daniels did ask for the broadest authority and did himself lease 55 wells? Does the Senator deny that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Secretary Daniels's acts will be referred to by me directly. I will tell just exactly what Secretary Daniels did. Secretary Daniels did lease wells in naval reserve No. 2.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And that was in the Democratic administration?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; that was in the Democratic administration.

Among these twenty-odd questions was one relating to the leasing of a portion of naval reserve No. 2 to the Boston-Pacific

Oil Co., made the subject of comment by the Senator from Indiana.

Fortunately, Mr. President, Mr. Finney, who has a perfectly intimate acquaintance with all the facts in this case, was at hand. Indeed, he was upon the stand at the time this matter was introduced, as follows:

Senator SPENCER. Mr. Finney, I want to get your judgment on a few statements which I read with a good deal of interest as coming from Secretary Denby, and some questions that were asked and answers that were given by him in response to an inquiry from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives. I should like to see what you think of them. The questions were asked and the answers given in March of this year. Here is question No. 1:

"Is it a fact that the then Secretary of the Navy, the Hon. Josephus Daniels, sent similar letters to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate and the House of Representatives, dated, respectively, March 29, 1920, and March 5, 1920, stating: '(a) It therefore becomes imperative "when viewed from an economic standpoint only that machinery be provided whereby wells may be drilled for protection against drainage from adjacent lands, or to supply oil for the Government's needs"; (b) and that excess oil from protective wells may be sold or storage provided for excess oil if considered advisable'?"

That will indicate the general character of the questions. But I want to invite especial attention to question No. 5, appearing at page 3559 of the hearings, referring to the lease made to the Boston-Pacific Oil Co., challenged by the Senator from Indiana:

Senator WALSH of Montana. The next is question 5:

"Question No. 5. Is it a fact that Secretary Daniels approved the leasihg without public advertisement by the Hon. J. Barton Payne, then Secretary of the Interior, and drilling of new wells on naval oil reserves?"

And the answer is:

"Answer. Yes. Under date of August 21, 1920, the then Secretary of the Navy informed the then Secretary of the Interior that the lease to the Boston-Pacific Oil Co. covering the drilling of five new wells on section 32 of naval petroleum reserve No. 2 was satisfactory to the Navy Department."

What have you to say as to the imputation there made that the policy of leasing the naval oil reserves without competitive bidding was inaugurated and initiated by Secretary John Barton Payne?

Mr. FINNEY. I do not think there is anything to that. I think the action in making these leases of these five wells and the 120 acres of section 28 was entirely correct and appropriate.

Senator WALSH of Montana. What do you think of putting out a statement the purpose of which is to inform the public that the policy of leasing naval reserve No. 3, as it was by Secretary Fall to the Mammoth Oil Co. without competitive bidding, out in New Mexico, and subsequently giving Doheny all leases on No. 3, was a policy inaugurated by Secretary Payne?

Mr. FINNEY. I do not think there was any action by Secretary Payne or the President under the other law at all.

Senator WALSH of Montana. Tell us about the matters referred to in the answer about drilling five new wells and leasing all the tract in naval reserve No. 2. It first refers to drilling five wells, and then to leasing 120 acres.

Mr. FINNEY. The leasing law, section 18, is already in the record several times, and it authorized the Secretary of the Interior to lease any wells that were then producing in the naval reserves.

Senator WALSH of Montana. He must lease them to whom?

Mr. FINNEY. To the owner of the mining location.

Senator WALSH of Montana. So there could be no possibility of a competitive bid there?

Mr. FINNEY. No, sir.

Senator WALSH of Montana. The law would not permit of it?

Mr. FINNEY. No room for any. Secondly, the President was, by the same section, given authority to lease additional wells within the area of any mining location which had upon it one or more producing wells. Thirdly, the President was given authority by the same section to lease the remainder of the area of any mining claim which had upon it one or more producing wells.

Now, that was the law. The first step under the leasing law was, naturally, an application for leasing of producing wells. Then the Boston-Pacific, getting down to this case, which had been given a lease for certain producing wells within the limits of a mining claim in reserve No. 2, held by that company, applied for the privilege or the right to drill five new wells to presumably offset the production on other lands. That matter was taken up with the Navy Department and with the Interior Department, and Secretaries Payne and Daniels agreed to leasing the wells.

Senator WALSH of Montana. Was there any room under the law for competitive bidding in these cases?

Mr. FINNEY. No; the preference, I should have stated, was granted by statute to the owner of the mining claim. These five wells were authorized to be leased and were leased to the Boston-Pacific Oil Co., the owner or claimant under the mining title.

Mr. President, the situation with respect to naval reserve No. 2 is indicated upon the map here before us. The Boston-Pacific Co. had been granted the right to drill five offset wells on a tract of land there, there being wells upon the adjacent sections that were draining that area. They were afterwards authorized to drill more wells, and eventually they were given a lease of the entire tract. As you will see, wells were drilled all around upon the adjacent property.

Mr. President, under the law there was no room for competitive bidding. There was only one man who could get the lease, and that was the man who owned the mining claim.

I have referred to this statement by Secretary Denby that was put in the RECORD over in the House, and brought into our hearings by Senator Spencer. I shall not take the time of the Senate to deal generally with it. In a general way, it merely makes the same charges that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] made here on the floor the other day. It is simply a tissue of misrepresentations from beginning to end.

Secretary Denby never prepared that statement. He never prepared these questions, nor the answers to the questions.

He would not dare to come before any committee of either House of Congress and submit himself to cross-examination; he did not know anything about the matter. He did not even know that naval reserve No. 2 had been leased, and so he could not know anything about this. That statement was prepared by some one in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, by some one who had studied the facts, and turned the statement over to Mr. Denby, and he offered it here.

Mr. President, Senator Spencer was an able lawyer. He was ready at all times, and under all circumstances, to rise and defend his party against any kind of imputations, and do what he could to free it from any charges that might be made against it. It will be remembered that he valiantly came to the aid of Mr. Newberry. He even made a minority report on the hearings in which he commended Secretary Fall for his patriotic action in leasing these naval oil reserves. Yet the mendacity of the charges made in this statement was so perfectly obvious to Senator Spencer, who had, I might say, some culture, as well as legal learning—the mendacity of the thing was so perfectly apparent to him that he did not even make these assertions or attempt upon this floor to back up the charges made in the pamphlet which was fathered by Secretary Denby, but which was prepared, as I have said, by somebody in the Department of the Interior; but the Senator from Indiana is perfectly willing to become responsible for the statements made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was just going to say, if the Senator will permit, that as long as he has commented on the statement made by former Secretary Denby, it might be well at this juncture to put that statement into the RECORD, if the Senator has it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will find it in House Document No. so-and-so. However, to relieve the Senator, I can tell him that it is all quoted here, and every statement in it is subjected to cross-examination by Senator Spencer and myself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I just thought that in the absence of Mr. Denby to speak for himself, it might be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So much for the charge that leases were made within the naval oil reserves by the Democratic administration without any competitive bidding. Of course, that is true; but the law forbade any competitive bidding. The law provided that only one man or corporation, and that the corporation which had the lease upon the property beforehand, could drill these wells.

There is another charge in this connection to which I desire to call attention. It is embraced in the concluding sentence of the first extract from the speech of the Senator which I read at the opening of my address:

Fifty million barrels of petroleum is a pretty liberal honorarium for the Democratic Secretary of the Interior to hand out to a Democratic committeeman and others at the head of private oil interests.

That statement is made in connection with the charge that Secretary Payne leased a large portion of the Salt Creek oil field, as a result of which the oil within the Teapot Dome was drained out. There is on the wall here a map showing the Teapot Dome and the adjacent Salt Creek field. This lower ellipse is the Teapot Dome. Above the narrow portion here is the Salt Creek field. Salt Creek field was discovered and developed before the law of 1920 was enacted, and even long before there was any general withdrawal of public oil lands to await legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me ask the Senator if it is not true that many of the claims were alleged to be fraudulent, and that the Democratic Attorney General was asked to prosecute in the name of the Government many of those claimants who were alleged to be trespassers?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is a little aside from this question. The question as to whether there were or were not fraudulent claims in the Salt Creek field has been discussed in the papers here recently. That is entirely aside from the question we are talking about, the leasing of the naval oil reserves.

An investigation of that subject was made by the Department of Justice a great many years ago. There is a report on file in the department. I asked for it some time ago, hoping that I might find time to go into the very question about which the Senator is now talking. I was advised by the Department of Justice that there was no such report there. I persisted, however, that there was such a report there, and I am glad to inform the Senate that just a few days ago they advised me that they had found the report.

There may or may not be ground for the charge that some of those claims were fraudulent. I do not know. They may or may not have been. I do not care whether they were or not; it had not a thing in the world to do with this matter. I trust the Senator from Indiana will take up that subject and demonstrate, if he can, by a proper investigation that those claims were fraudulent and that the leases should never have been issued to anyone. I should like to do it myself, but there is some evidence that the people feel that I am too active in investigations.

However, Mr. President, long before this time these lands were taken up under the old placer mining law, bear in mind, and wells were sunk all over this area. But the lands around the edge of the property seem never to have been taken up, though, of course, whenever a well is sunk, then prospectors rush in and appropriate the lands immediately adjacent to the area that has been demonstrated to be oil bearing. So the lands around the center of the Salt Creek field were all taken up, but those along the margin remained in the Government, when the withdrawal orders were made, and no one was thereafter permitted to take these lands; but when the act of 1920 was passed, those lands, not being in any reserve of any character whatever, became open to leasing just the same as lands in my State, just the same as lands in Utah, just the same as lands in California, all over the West; those lands became subject to leasing under the provisions of section 17 of the act of 1920.

What did that provide? It provided that whenever there were any of these lands within the area of a known geological field, a producing field, no prospecting permit could be granted, but leases should be granted by competitive bidding, and it became the duty of Mr. Payne, when he became Secretary of the Interior, to offer to lease those lands to the highest bidder which he proceeded to do. Those who are interested in the matter will find a list of all the leases on page 1080 of the hearings, volume 1.

Mr. President, those lands were thus put up for competitive bidding, advertised, the whole world was at liberty to come in and bid, and many did come in and bid, the royalty being fixed at 30 per cent of the production. The Interior Department recommended that the royalty be fixed at 25 per cent, the lease to be given to the one who would offer the greatest bonus.

Secretary Payne took his pencil and drew it across "25 per cent" and inserted "30 per cent," and those areas were leased at a 30 per cent royalty, together with a bonus, the man who bid the highest bonus getting the land.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator does not deny the fact that those leases given at that time have drained the Navy's oil?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I deny it. The excuse offered by Fall and by Sinclair for leasing this entire area of the Teapot Dome, some 9,000 acres, the lower part of it 4 miles away from the nearest well in the Salt Creek field—4 miles away—was that the wells in the Salt Creek field were draining the oil out of Teapot Dome. That proposition has been resolutely denied by the representatives of the Government of the United States, and is to-day denied, as shown by the letter of Captain Stuart, which has been read in evidence here this morning.

There was some evidence introduced before the committee that wells within the Salt Creek field; that is, immediately adjacent to the line, were draining to some extent, some possibly appreciable extent, the oil in the naval oil reserves, but that the effect of wells away up in the body of Salt Creek field could be felt at all in the Teapot Dome was just simply absurd. So that these lands were thus leased by Secretary Payne.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The leases that were given by Mr. Payne were just outside of Teapot Dome.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They were just outside the Teapot Dome and they were clear beside of the Salt Creek field, reaching down in this neighborhood [indicating] and coming into contact at this narrow place here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator denies that those wells drained the Teapot Dome?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I deny that those wells drained the Teapot Dome, and state that that was a poor excuse offered as a justification for the leasing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Was not the Senator's main justification for relying on the testimony of Doheny, with reference to draining naval reserve No. 2, the fact that the wells adjoining No. 2, owned by private interests, were draining the naval reserve?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is not appreciative of the fact that geological structure has a great deal to do with this matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That may be true, but I am asking the Senator——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is asking me. Now, we will talk about this right here. Here are the leases right here [indicating]. The lands adjacent here were being drilled up and were producing enormously, and were undoubtedly draining the oil from this naval reserve No. 1, as indicated upon the map. It was with reference to that condition of affairs that Mr. Doheny was talking, and not with reference to the Teapot Dome at all. He likewise was talking in relation to the wells on naval reserve No. 2, scattered all through naval reserve No. 2, where the Government owned each alternate section, and every other section was held in private ownership.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Was not No. 3 referred to by Secretary Payne himself in his letter, stating that the Navy's oil was being drained?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was not. He had no reference to that at all. He had reference to naval reserve No. 2.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not certain about that in my own mind. I was asking for information.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am giving the Senator the information. The situation is as I have indicated. However, that is the way these were leased and that is the justification.

One of the bidders for these lands, as I am advised, was the Producers & Refiners Co., of which Mr. Barnett, of Denver, who was for quite a long while Democratic national committeeman from the State of Colorado, was the president. His company was the bidder for a considerable area of the land, and it was awarded to him because he was the highest bidder for that land. What could Secretary Payne do under the circumstances? I address that question to the Senator from Indiana. Will the Senator from Indiana give me his attention?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was busy at the moment and did not hear the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was speaking about the lease to Mr. Barnett's company, the Producers & Refiners Co., to which the Senator referred. His company was the highest bidder for that tract.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will just say in this connection that I am assembling some material on that proposition which I hope to be able to incorporate in an address at a later time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Assuming for the purpose that he was the highest bidder, what could Secretary Payne do?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I say I would rather not answer at this time. I have a lot of information on that subject.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield just a moment for a brief statement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to tell the Senator the story of an old colored man out in Kansas City who, in spite of the fact that it was right after the Civil War, still stuck to the Democratic Party. He used to make speeches. Each time he would address the colored voters with these words: "I knows that the Democratic Party is the party what freed the slaves, but I doesn't want to be drawn into that part of the argument." Then he would say no more about it. It seems to me, after the Supreme Court has passed on this question and Cabinet officers have been thrown out of the Cabinet, that the position of some Republicans, not many, but some of them here, is, "I knows the Republican Party had nothing to do with this leasing of Teapot Dome, but I does not want to be drawn into that side of the argument."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have explained to the Senate just what justification there is for the statement made by the Senator from Indiana that the Democratic administration gave an honorarium to the Democratic committeemen from the State of Colorado of 50,000,000 barrels of oil—said by the receiver for

Mr. Sinclair to have been drained by Mr. Barnett's company out of Teapot Dome.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. He was one of the coreceivers and it was incorporated in his report.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but the Senator did not say he was the receiver for Mr. Sinclair.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I said he was one of the receivers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; he was one of the receivers.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will have a good many more facts to give the Senate before I get through with this matter, and with reference to the Salt Creek field, definitely and specifically.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hope we get facts in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to read from the hearings about these leases made by Secretary Payne, as appears in volume 1, page 693, November 1, 1923:

Senator WALSH. In connection with the testimony given by Mr. Reavis on yesterday to the effect that a bonus of $10,000,000 might reasonably have been anticipated if competitive bids had been asked for in connection with the leasing of the Teapot Dome, I offer a plat exhibiting the edge leases on the Salt Creek field, with the names of parties to whom leases were issued, and the royalty received in each case, as well as the aggregate royalty paid.

I regret very much that we have not that plat here. It would show every lease made by Secretary Payne and the party to whom it was leased and the bonus that was paid.

Senator LENROOT. That is, the rate of royalty?

Senator WALSH. Not the rate of royalty, as that is uniform except in the case of one lease, where the royalty was one quarter, or 25 per cent.

During the administration of Secretary Payne notification was given that these leases would be offered at auction, or proposals—I do not recall which—the commissioner proposing 25 per cent. Secretary Payne approved the proposition to offer them for public sale, but in his own handwriting, across the order, directed that the royalty be 30 per cent, and the bonus for each lease is scheduled here—they all appear 30 per cent—and the aggregate bonuses amount to $1,687,000.

Senator JONES. On how many acres?

Senator WALSH. Well, I have not computed the acreage, Senator. I will have that done.

Senator JONES. The plat will show the acreage, will it?

Senator WALSH. Yes, sir.

Senator JONES. And it can be computed?

Senator WALSH. Yes, sir; it can be computed and I will have it done.

Senator LADD. Is it on the whole field?

Senator WALSH. No; this exhibits what it is. It is only on the edge water leases, the edge of the field to a very large extent, with that part that did not pass by patent or pass by adjustment under the provisions of section 18, and the royalties were as there specified, 12½ per cent.

Senator JONES. Does that show the offset wells on the naval reserves?

Senator WALSH. No; this does not show those wells.

Senator JONES. But it shows the wells just outside the reserve line?

Senator WALSH. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. Does it show production?

Senator WALSH. No.

I referred to the matter of the drainage of Teapot Dome from wells within the Salt Creek field. The testimony by the experts of the Government is that whatever drainage there was would be amply taken care of by the drilling of just a few offset wells in this narrow region of the field, just exactly as was done over here [indicating on map].

Prior to the time that Mr. Daniels quit office he became impressed with the idea, advanced by Mr. Doheny and by Mr. Phelan, to which I had temerity to call the attention of the Senate when the bill was under consideration, that there was very serious drainage taking place in the eastern portion of naval reserve No. 1 in the State of California.

Secretary Daniels undertook to meet the situation and called for bids for the sinking of 22 offset wells within the reserve in order to protect it against this drainage. But, as I said the other day, he went out of office before that was completed. His successor immediately renewed the advertisement, and Mr. Doheny was the successful bidder and secured leases entitling him to drill the 22 wells as offset wells. The committee found no reason to believe that that transaction thus carried out by Secretary Fall and Secretary Denby had any sort of doubt about it. So far as the committee was able to discern, it was a perfectly legitimate transaction for the purpose of protecting the reserve.

I understand that later on a question was raised as to the validity of those leases under the law, but the committee found no cause for criticism of them in any shape or manner and never has criticized them. What they did criticize was the leasing of the entire reserve upon the pretext that it was necessary to protect the reserve against drainage.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to some of the more glaring parts of the address of the Senator from Indiana. On page 5538 of his address made on March 29 last I find the following:

The record shows, contrary to the views of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], that the "conspiracy" to get control of the oil reserves of the country was not formed in Chicago during the Republican convention of 1920, but was formed in the city of Washington during the Democratic administration of President Wilson; and it was participated in by high officials of that administration and aided and abetted by still other Democrats of high standing.

Reference has been made to the act of June 4, 1920, and it is assailed as evidence of the conspiracy thus adverted to by the Senator from Indiana. I do not know how we could reach a situation such as that suggested here unless we gave to the Secretary of the Navy or some one else the power to issue leases for offset wells, unless, of course, the Government of the United States went in and drilled wells.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the Senator was opposed to that plan, was he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It never was proposed by anybody that the United States should engage in the business of taking oil out of the ground.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And because of that fact the Senator was in favor of offset wells in the reserve where needed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He was in favor, as a matter of course, of legislation which would enable the Secretary to drill the wells in the adjacent territory, and that the leasing of the wells was the way that everybody thought was wise.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the act of February 25, 1920, permitted the leasing also of wells just outside of the reserve to drain the reserve.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The act of 1920, as a matter of course, permitted the leasing of wells anywhere upon the public domain.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The act of June 4, 1920, permitted the Secretary of the Navy to lease the reserves themselves, and the other act——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suppose probably if the Senator from Indiana had been here he would have made some objection that they should not lease within a certain distance of the naval oil reserves, and perhaps a provision of that kind would have been a wise one. I suppose probably he would have thought of it, but no one else did. The Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. La Follette, and the Senator from Iowa, Mr. Kenyon, did not think of it. The Senator from Indiana can not really think he is the only safeguard of the public interest in this body?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; but the Senator will admit a safeguard ought to have been there?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course. Now, in the light of what has transpired, it would have been a wise thing to keep a margin between the lessee on the public lands and the naval oil reserve. I am not sure about that. I have not given thought to it. It just occurred to me now. No one has heretofore suggested anything of the kind.

So that, Mr. President, everybody at the time having confidence in Secretary Daniels that he would not lease any more of those lands than was absolutely necessary to protect the oil within the reserves, and it being the general belief that the Navy Department would be careful to conserve the great oil deposits within the reserves, the power had to be placed somewhere, and was given to the Secretary of the Navy by the act of June 4, 1920.

Let me go on with the speech of the Senator from Indiana. On the same page, referring to Secretary Daniels, he said:

He needed no legislative enactment to empower him to leave the oil in the ground, where it had been for centuries. What Secretary Daniels wanted was power to enable him, in his discretion, to take the oil out of the ground.

I want to ask the Senator from Indiana just what he would do under those circumstances? Just what provision would he have made?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Just what I said there. If I understand it, the former Secretary of the Navy had time and again said, or at least on one notable occasion he said, that he tried to keep the oil in the ground until 1921.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but he found that he could not do it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But he said until 1921—from 1914 to 1921.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think that was his language.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That meant until March 4, 1921, when the Democratic administration went out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As a matter of fact, prior to that, on June 4, a rider to an appropriation bill amending the leasing act proposed by him was adopted, and passed by the Senate, giving him permission to take oil out of the ground.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but the Senator has not answered my question; that is, Secretary Daniels, representing this situation to Congress, asked for permission to make provision so that the situation could be met, and it was met by either authorizing him to drill the offset wells or to get some one else to drill such wells.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Or do anything else.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What would the Senator from Indiana have done under the circumstances?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not talking about that; I am speaking of the former Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no; the Senator is assailing the act of June 4, 1920——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do assail it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And practically charging Secretary Daniels with corruption in office.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I am not charging anybody with corruption in office. I have been very careful not to do that. What I have done, Mr. President, is to say that Secretary Daniels himself was the sponsor back of the amendment of June 4, 1920.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Giving to one man all power over the naval reserves.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And I am asking the Senator just exactly what kind of legislation he would have proposed to take care of that situation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think I will propose some legislation along that line if the committee that is charged with the responsibility does not do so pretty soon. That is too much authority to rest in one man's hands, in my opinion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think it will be abused after this, as it has been.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not so sure about that. I hope it never will be; it should not have been abused at all.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Montana think he should make it perfectly clear, if he has not already done so, that the fraudulent and corrupt leasing of Teapot Dome was not done by sanction of the statute of June 4, 1920?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That it was done in violation of that statute.

Mr. GLASS. It was done, as the Supreme Court has determined, in violation of the statute, and the statute was seized upon by the men who did it as a pretense for perpetrating that very fraud.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and the suggestion now, Mr. President, that there is something wrong with the statute is merely for the purpose of putting up a smoke screen to obscure the fact of the violation of that law and the corrupt leasing of this land in defiance of that law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator from Montana himself has admitted it is wrong.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Admitted that what is wrong?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That the amendment of June 4, 1920, is wrong.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What would the Senator say was wrong about it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understood the Senator to say the other day that he was not satisfied with the way in which it had worked out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I did not. The Senator asked me about section 18 of the leasing act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What I asked the Senator about, or what I meant to ask him about, was the amendment of June 4. I will ask the Senator now if he is satisfied with the amendment of June 4, 1920.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is again endeavoring to divert attention from the matter before us, if I may say so. I was in no wise responsible for section 18 of the act; the Senator will find no such section in the bill that I introduced; I had no part in it whatever. I agreed that something ought to be done to take care of that situation. Now, I am advised—and I have no doubt that it is true—that there was fraud committed under the provisions of section 18 of that act. That is neither here nor there. Fraud has been committed under other acts of Congress. But just now we are trying to find out who is responsible for leasing the naval oil reserves contrary to law, not in obedience to law or in conformity with law. The Senator continues:

> In other words, he expressly asked for an amendment to the leasing act—

Well, that is a matter of language—> which would enable him in his discretion and at his pleasure to take the naval reserve oil out of the ground and do with it what he pleased. He asked for power not only to take it out of the ground but power to sell it, to store it, to exchange it.

I should like to ask the Senator again if the Secretary of the Navy was to be authorized to take the oil out of the ground through offset wells, what he was to do with it except to sell it, to store it, or to exchange it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Secretary of the Navy said, continued to say, and, so far as I know, yet says, that from 1914 to 1921 he continued to do everything he could to keep the oil in the ground, while I am saying that is just what he did not do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is not answering my question; he is criticizing this law——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I still criticize it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And he is calling attention to power invested in the Secretary of the Navy which ought not, he says, to be confided in him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask him what change he would make.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have already told the Senator what change I would make. I would take a lot of power away from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but the Senator would not take the power away from him to sell oil, would he?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would certainly take the power away to give one man the complete control over the oil reserves of this Nation that we might have to depend upon ultimately for our national preservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator does not live in a public-land State. If he did he would know that for years similar powers have been invested in the Secretary of the Interior, and the public lands can not be disposed of in any other way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That would not make any difference, so far as my opinion of this law is concerned.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Indiana continues:

> Why, he even asked for power in this amendment to go into the refining business, and, as if this were not sufficient, he then asked for a blanket authorization to "otherwise dispose of the oil and gas products" in the naval reserves in whatever way it suited him. It was a proposal to place in the hands of one man, the Secretary of the Navy, all of the naval oil reserves of the United States, to be used by him in his discretion without let or hindrance, without any check by any governmental authority.

And up to the present time there has never been a criticism of the execution of the law except in the case of the two reserves which were leased to Sinclair and Doheny.

The Senator from Indiana continues:

> No one can claim that this proposition was in the interest of conserving the oil that was in the ground.
> The Senator from Virginia supported this amendment. The Senator from Montana supported it. The amendment became a law through the process of being attached as a rider to the naval appropriation bill, June 4, 1920.

What does that mean? That, of course, carries the intimation that there was a powerful dispute here upon the floor in relation to the act of June 4, 1920; that presumably all of the Republicans on the other side of the Chamber were aligned against it and that it had powerful supporters upon this side, including the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Montana. If that is not what this means, can anybody explain what it does mean? Neither the Senator from Virginia nor the Senator from Montana supported the amendment in any other sense than that they were here when it was passed by unanimous vote in the Senate and without a dissenting voice from any quarter, as the Senator from Indiana well knows.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator has no objection to being mentioned as one who did support it, has he?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but I do not care to be misrepresented.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That does not misrepresent the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; it does misrepresent me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator did vote for it, did he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I have indicated, the purpose of that statement was to convey the idea that there was a fight on the floor here and that the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Montana were here standing up fighting for the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It does not say so, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It does not say so, no; and the Senator has not said that Franklin K. Lane was a corrupt official either.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Of course, he has not said that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has not said anything that would lead anyone to think so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have just stated the facts and drawn the conclusions very definitely, and the conclusions are what the Senator objects to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So far as stating the facts is concerned, when the statement is made that the Senator from Montana supported it and the Senator from Virginia supported it, what is meant?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Either the Senator did support it or he did not. Did he or not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is not the truth at all. Supporting it means arguing in favor of it, talking in favor of it, voting in favor of it, and so on, and so on, as the Senator very well knows.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What does not supporting it mean, then, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not care to discuss the matter further.

The Senator from Indiana in his speech continues:

No sooner was the amendment which he wrote, and which the Democratic Senators in this body supported, operative, than he began to permit the Navy's oil to be taken out of the reserves by private oil corporations. He did this without advertising for or permitting competitive bids. He did it merely by holding private conferences with representatives of private corporations, just as the thoroughly discredited Secretary Fall did later, and giving them leases in the oil reserves. The records of the Navy Department indisputably back up this assertion in case after case.

What does that mean, Mr. President? It means that Secretary Daniels granted leases in naval reserve No. 2 and in no other reserve to the parties who were entitled to leases under the provisions of the law which authorized him to lease wells within the reserve where other wells were there draining the ground, but he could not possibly grant a lease to anyone else or offer it by competitive bidding of any character.

Again, the Senator from Indiana says:

So far as the official record shows, Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior in the Democratic administration, was the originator of the proposal to lease naval reserve oil lands to private oil interests, to be exploited by them. The record shows that on August 1, 1917, Secretary Lane communicated with other members of the Cabinet, namely, Secretary of the Navy Daniels, Secretary of War Baker, Secretary of Labor Wilson, Secretary of Commerce Redfield, and Secretary of Agriculture Houston, to the effect that naval reserve No. 2 was being drained by private oil wells located just outside its borders, and that as an offset territory within the reserve ought to be leased at once to private corporations. This communication was in the form of a formal letter which exists in the files of all these departments.

That, Mr. President, is offered as excusing or justifying the leasing of this entire naval oil reserve here [indicating on map] and the Teapot Dome shown on the other map over there [indicating].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the Senator refers now to what Fall did, of course it does not justify it; of course he was corrupt, and, of course, was thoroughly discredited; and I say that he should have a prison sentence. I have said that before. All of those who have betrayed the country should be brought to justice and in a hurry whether they are Democrats or Republicans. That is my position.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator up to this time has not given us very much aid in that direction.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am doing everything I can to help the Senator or anybody else who is interested in bringing the criminals to justice.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Some of us got there a little earlier.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That may be true, but now that I am here I want to help.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But up to the present time the Senator has not endeavored to aid in any appreciable way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. At present I am trying to show that not all the crooks were in any one party, and I think I have done so conclusively.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There may be some information in the possession of some citizens of the Senator's State that may be valuable to him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That has been brought up time and again, and the Senator may refer to it as often as he desires.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Indiana in his speech continued:

The Senator from Montana, however, is authority for the statement that the campaign to permit private oil interests to invade and exploit public oil reserves began earlier. He is authority for the statement that it began as soon as the Democratic Party came into power in 1913, and that the campaign was headed by Secretary of the Interior Lane and Democratic leaders in both branches of Congress, including the Senator himself.

I now desire to ask the Senator from Indiana if he can propose any law for the disposition of these public lands out West that are supposed to be valuable for oil other or different from the law that we now have, other or different from the law that was passed by me by the bill which was introduced in 1914. There was a big fight, Mr. President. I led in that fight in favor of the leasing system as against the system of permanent alienation of these lands; and that was the one controversy that was roused by this legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, this admission the Senator made on the floor of the Senate September 3, 1919, when the leasing act, now a law, was being debated.

This "admission"—this "admission the Senator made on the floor," and so forth.

It was in an attempted answer to this direct and serious charge of the late Senator La Follette that the Senator from Montana divulged the fact—

Actually wrung out of the Senator from Montana by some process of examination—divulged the fact, offered in defense of his attitude at that time.

There was no "defense" about it, as the excerpt which the Senator read clearly discloses. There was nothing "divulged." There was nothing "admitted." The statement was a perfectly free statement upon my part on the floor of the Senate that I had in 1914 introduced the prototype of the bill under consideration.

Page 5540:

The Senator from Montana will not deny the charge that he himself at the time the leasing act was up, was the chief advocate of the proposition to permit private oil interests to operate in naval reserves, upon the ground that other private oil interests, by locating wells immediately outside the naval reserves, were draining those reserves.

Which, of course, implies that the Senator was fighting for that proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator was fighting for the whole bill, was he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was fighting, of course, for the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And that was part of the bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was part of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the Senator defended that part of the bill on the floor?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And quoted Mr. Doheny as authority.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But where does the Senator get the information that I was the principal advocate of that?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Because the Senator was the principal advocate of the bill, was he not? And did not the Senator say so?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but there are a lot of other things in the bill besides that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Why, of course, there are.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And it was the other things that I was particularly interested in, as I have indicated, where there were not any oil reserves.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the Senator was particularly interested in that feature, was he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator spoke for it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator did that for the purpose of misleading those who heard him or who would read his speech.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator does not deny, does he, that he made the speech in favor——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not deny that I made the speech read there. I do deny that there was any "admission." I do deny that there was any "divulging." I do deny that I was the principal advocate of that provision of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. After making that statement, did not the Senator wind up with this final sentence:

That is all I care to say about this being a Standard Oil bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. All right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator assert that it was?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The late Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. La Follette, had just asserted that it was.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, the late Senator from Wisconsin has been quoted here. What he said is in the RECORD. The Senator from Indiana has put it in ad infinitum; and I have called attention to the fact that, whatever he had to say about it, he eventually voted for the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I have not put in one-tenth of what the Seantor had to say about this being a Standard Oil bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but the Senator has not put in that Senator La Follette voted for it, just as I did.

The Senator continues:

The Senator from Montana will not deny the charge that he himself at the time the leasing act was up, was the chief advocate of the proposition to permit private oil interests to operate in naval reserves, upon the ground that other private oil interests, by locating wells immediately outside the naval reserves, were draining those reserves, and the only way for the Government and the Navy to obtain the oil from reserves was to permit their exploitation by private corporations. The entire debate on the leasing act, which became a law in February, 1920, is filled with arguments advanced by the Senator in support of this proposition and to support him in his arguments he quoted Mr. Edward L. Doheny.

Can the Senator call attention to any other?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; I think on the 25th of August—I am not certain of that date—the Senator justified his position on the proposition of leasing the naval reserves along the same line. I may be mistaken about this date, however.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator give us a reference to that part of the RECORD?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think I have it here. The Senator might go on with his speech for a minute or two, and I will try to find it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator continues:

We will leave Mr. Doheny for a moment, but come back to him presently. Now, let us balance up the situation. The record shows that almost as soon as the Democratic Party came into power in 1913 an extensive and intensive campaign began, headed by Secretary Lane, participated in by the Democratic leaders in both branches of Congress, with the Senator from Montana as its spokesman in this body, to open up naval oil reserves for exploitation by private oil corporations, upon the ground that private wells just outside those reservations were draining the oil from the Navy's reserves, and it was a matter of self-defense to sink offset wells.

Mr. President, I shall take no more time in discussing this address of the Senator. I fear I have tired the Senate long ago. I know of no protection that anyone has against aspersions, so freely indulged in by the Senator from Indiana in his various addresses upon this subject, except in the self-respect and gentlemanly instincts of Members who speak on this floor under the privilege of the Constitution to be exempt from being called to answer in any other place for what they say here.

I am not at all alarmed that this effort by the Senator from Indiana to cast aspersions upon my part in this legislation, or upon the part of the Democratic administration, will have any more effect upon the public mind than the attempt of a similar character that was made by the Republican National Committee in 1924, or by Mr. Denby when he submitted his questions and answers to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, or by Senator Spencer when he gave consequence to these questions and answers by introducing them in the hearings before the committee. I have no doubt that the public, except a very limited few, will form their judgment about this matter, as they have in the past, by the indisputable facts disclosed in the investigation.

Mr. President, some time ago former Secretary Payne prepared a brief compendium of the laws applicable to the disposition of the public oil lands and the naval reserves, so far as the law applied to the disposition of the same. I ask that the same be incorporated in the RECORD as Exhibit B to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ASSERTS OUTSIDERS DRAIN TEAPOT DOME—RECEIVER FOR SINCLAIR FILES REPORT THAT GOVERNMENT HAS LOST $60,000,000 TO DATE—ASSAILS EXPERT ESTIMATES—CALLS 50,000,000 BARRELS IN RESERVE A MYTH—NAVAL CORECEIVER DOES NOT CONCUR

(Special to the New York Times)

CHEYENNE, WYO., January 11.—The Teapot Dome naval oil reserve is pictured as a "political orphan" that has been drained by wells in the adjoining Salt Creek field and is virtually valueless as a source of oil for the Navy in a special report filed in the Federal court for Wyoming by Albert E. Watts, who represented the Harry F. Sinclair interests as a receiver during the litigation which resulted in the return of the reserve to the Government on the ground that the lease was tainted with fraud.

Watts served as receiver with Commander H. A. Stuart, of the Navy. If his conclusions are correct, drainage has cost the Government more than $60,000,000, and is continuing.

Fifty millions of barrels of petroleum estimated by the Government experts to have been contained by the first Wall Creek sand under the reserve are missing, Watts's report relates, and infers that it is obvious that this petroleum was drained away by privately owned wells in the Salt Creek field.

Watts ridicules as a "legal fiction" the contention of experts for the Government that there is not drainage from the reserve into the Salt Creek wells.

Predicating his opinion upon the records of 84 wells drilled on the reserve and upon his experience of 25 years in the oil business, Watts warns the Government that there has been drainage and now is drainage, and advises that the actual performance of the wells is more reliable than the estimates of geologists upon whose testimony in the annulment trial the "legal fiction" of nondrainage was based.

SAYS DRAINAGE BEGAN LONG AGO

Watts's special report is supplemental to the main report. In the latter he and the coreceiver, Commander Stuart, were in agreement.

"The subject provoking the chief and, I may say, the only real difficulty arising between the coreceivers," says Watts in his report, "developed over the methods to be employed by the receivers to preserve the receiver's estate from drainage from wells drilled outside of naval reserve No. 3, such wells having been drilled on lands under Government supervision.

"Over such lands there existed no jurisdiction by your court in so far as the litigation involving the receivership was concerned. It is my opinion, based on many months of contact with naval reserve No. 3 and from some 25 years of observation and experience in the oil industry, that naval reserve No. 3 is now being drained by wells located off the reserve, and had been drained prior to the establishment of the lands as a reserve, and, furthermore, it was seriously being drained at the time of the leasing of the reserve.

"The high sounding and rosy representations of Government experts as to the petroleum content of naval reserve No. 3, made at the time of its being leased, have all failed to materialize, although some 84 holes have been drilled to test out the promising formations and prove the representations of the Government bureaus made for the purpose of compelling an unusually burdensome task for the lessee.

CALLS OIL IN SAND BEDS A MYTH

"It is a notorious fact that, although Government bureaus represented to the lessee that there was some 50,000,000 barrels of oil contained in the first Wall Creek sand within the reserve, not one barrel of oil from this sand has ever been produced, although dozens of wells have been drilled in and through this sand.

"Evidence showing that oil was once present has been secured, but to this date the only oil being produced, or ever was produced, from the first Wall Creek sand was and is in the Salt Creek field, lying directly north and contiguous to naval reserve No. 3.

"When the receivers took charge of the property there was being produced daily crude oil in approximately the amount of 3,700 barrels from all sands then developed. Under the program followed by the receivers this daily production was decreased to about 600 barrels per day at the closing of the receivership.

"According to naval experts this amount of production is barely enough, even though it was suitable for the purpose, to fuel a battleship during one afternoon when such battleship was engaged in active maneuvers.

"Since the receivers have taken charge they have already plugged five wells in the second Wall Creek sand, which have exhausted themselves and ceased to produce oil in sufficient amount to pay their operating expenses. Of the four wells drilled into the second Wall Creek sand on what was presumed to be proved territory, three of these wells have been abandoned because they have not produced enough oil to pay their operating expenses.

"Protests were made by me as to the damage to the reserve, but to no avail. Drainage will continue, it is no respecter of academic desire or hopeful ambition."

Watts's report incorporates correspondence between representatives of the Government and the owners of wells in the Salt Creek field adjacent to the Teapot reserve, relative to payment by the owners of these wells of a royalty to the Government for the increased production from these wells, which the Government represented would result from the shutting down of the Teapot wells. The Government requested such royalty and the owners of the Salt Creek wells politely declined to pay it.

THE OIL SITUATION—POLICY OF WILSON ADMINISTRATION AS TO LEASING OIL LANDS

The attempt to justify the secret leasing of all the naval reserves, the entire Teapot Dome and Elk Hills to Sinclair and Doheny, by the specious and confusing statement that 150 leases were made by Secretary Payne outside the naval reserves and that certain lands or wells were leased in a naval reserve during the Wilson administration is like comparing the making of a back fire to prevent the spread of a prairie fire with the deliberate starting of an incendiary fire such as caused the destruction of Smyrna. What the Wilson administration did was to follow the national policy established by Presidents Taft and Wilson and by the Congress when it passed the leasing law to protect and conserve the naval reserves—to keep the oil for the use of the Navy for some great emergency; while Secretaries Fall and Denby deliberately defies this national policy and secretly leased the reserves, thus destroying the reserves.

A simple statement of fact will make this plain.

Before the passage by Congress February 25, 1920, of the leasing act authorizing the leasing of Government-owned oil lands on a royalty basis, the only law by which the public could take out oil was the old placer mining law, which allowed a person to make a mining location on 20 acres, or eight persons to club together and located 160 acres—the same law which applied to gold or silver. If the claimant followed up his claim with diligence and brought in a producing well, he became the owner and entitled to a patent, and the Government received nothing.

The leasing act changed this policy, authorized the Secretary of the Interior to issue rules and regulations, to fix the royalty to be paid at not less than 12½ per cent of the oil taken out, and pursuant to such regulations to lease the public lands. Thus the Government received substantial royalty and retained ownership of the lands.

Before the passage of the leasing law two things had happened—

First. Many locations had been filed under the placer mining law by people who thus claimed title to the lands; to the extent that these claims were valid, the claimants had to be recognized; this was true even inside the naval reserves where locations were made in good faith before the reserves were created.

Second. The Government established the national policy of setting aside oil lands for the use of the Navy for a future emergency, it being well known that our supply of commercial oil would in a few years be exhausted, thus—

Naval reserve No. 1, in California: The Elk Hills, containing some 32,000 acres, was created by President Taft September 2, 1912.

Naval reserve No. 2, also in California, was created by President Taft December 13, 1912, containing roughly 30,000 acres, but more than 20,000 acres of this was at the time privately owned, and much of the remainder covered by mining locations.

Naval reserve No. 3, Teapot Dome in Wyoming, was created by President Wilson April 30, 1915; this contained 9,481 acres; was all Government land.

Some claims under the old placer law had been filed on lands in these naval reserves before the reserves were created.

WHEN PAYNE BECAME SECRETARY

This was the situation when John Barton Payne was appointed Secretary of the Interior February 28, 1920 (qualified March 15, 1920). The leasing law (in force February 25, 1920) made it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to administer the law, i. e., to issue rules and regulations for prospecting the leasing, and to fix the royalty to be paid on lands outside the naval reserves, and to decide not only as to the validity of claims pending under the old law but where two or more persons had conflicting claims, to decide between them. It was the policy of the Congress that lands outside the naval reserves should be leased—but that the naval reserves should not be leased, unless a claimant under the old law came strictly under the terms of the leasing law.

REPUBLICAN SMOKE SCREEN

The Republicans try to defend Secretaries Fall and Denby and attempt to make a smoke screen of the fact that Secretary Payne leased certain oil lands. They do not state what every one should know, now fully brought out by the Senate committee, that Secretary Payne made no secret leases, that his door was wide open, everything was public, and the leasing law strictly followed and the policy of the Government upheld and maintained; that with the approval and support of President Wilson and Secretary of the Navy Daniels the naval reserves were fully protected, and but for Secretaries Fall and Denby would now be safe and intact.

A brief reference to the leasing law and the undisputed facts make this clear.

1. The law as to lands not known to contain oil outside naval reserves

Following the policy of Congress to develop and lease oil lands, the leasing act provided (sec. 13) that persons who desired to prospect for oil on lands not known to contain oil might obtain permits as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, under such necessary and proper rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any applicant qualified under this act a prospecting permit, which shall give the exclusive right, for a period not exceeding two years, to prospect for oil or gas upon not to exceed 2,560 acres of land wherein such deposits belong to the United States and are not within any known geological structure of a producing oil or gas field upon condition that the permittee shall begin drilling operations within six months."

If the prospector found oil or gas, section 14 provided in terms that he should be entitled to a lease as follows:

"That upon establishing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that valuable deposits of oil or gas have been discovered within the limits of the land embraced in any permit, the permittee shall be entitled to a lease for one-fourth of the land embraced in the prospecting permit * * * for a term of 20 years upon a royalty of 5 per cent * * * and shall be entitled to a preference right to a lease for the remainder of the land in his prospecting permit at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent * * * the amount of the royalty to be determined by competitive bidding or fixed by regulations prescribed by the Secretary."

And in section 16 it is provided:

That no wells shall be drilled within 200 feet of any of the outer boundaries of the lands within the permit unless adjoining lands belonging to private persons.

2. As to public lands known to contain oil

Section 17 of the leasing act provides:

"That all unappropriated deposits of oil or gas situated within the known geological structure of a producing oil or gas field and the unentered lands (lands not entered under the old law) containing the same, not subject to preferential lease, may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior to the highest responsible bidder by competitive bidding under general regulations to qualified applicants in areas not exceeding 640 acres * * * such leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such bonus as may be accepted and of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease, which shall not be less than 12½ per cent in amount or value of the production, and the payment of $1 per acre per annum."

As to lands where locations had been made under the old placer law and the claimant was willing to compromise by accepting a lease under the leasing act, section 18 provided:

"That upon relinquishment to the United States * * * of all right, title, and interest claimed and possessed prior to July 3, 1910, and continuously since * * * under the preexisting placer mining law to any oil or gas bearing land upon which there has been drilled one or more oil or gas wells to discover embraced in the Executive order of withdrawal issued (by President Taft) September 27, 1909, and not within any naval petroleum reserve, and upon payment as royalty * * * if in possession of such land, undisputed by any other claimant prior to July 1, 1919, shall be entitled to a lease thereon from the United States for a period of 20 years at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent.

[NOTE.—From the foregoing sections it is clear that as to lands not known to contain oil Congress desired to encourage prospecting and gave the successful prospector the absolute right to a lease; and, as to lands known to contain oil but outside the naval reserves, provided in terms for their leasing by the Secretary of the Interior by competitive bidding; and required that the rights of persons who in good faith had made locations under the old law should be protected, and gave them the right to come in and surrender their claims acquired under the old law and accept leases under the leasing act. For the Secretary of the Interior to have refused to carry out these provisions would have been an arbitrary violation of the law and would have made him subject to action by mandamus.]

3. As to lands within the naval reserves

Section 18 provides also—

"That as to all like claims (under old placer law) situate within a naval petroleum reserve the producing wells thereon only shall be leased, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, upon the terms and payment of royalties for past and future production as herein provided for in the leasing of claims. No wells shall be drilled in the land subject to this provision within 660 feet of any such leased well without the consent of the lessee."

Then this provision as to the President:

"The authority of the President—must use his discretion."

The act continues:

"Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, lease the remainder of any part of any such claim upon which such wells have been drilled, and in the event of such leasing said claimant or his successor shall have a preference right to such lease: And provided further, That he may permit the drilling of additional wells by the claimant or his successor within the limited area of 660 feet theretofore provided for upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe."

No claimant guilty of fraud shall have a lease.

[NOTE.—From the above it is clear that where a claimant under the old placer law had located on lands within the naval reserve before the reserve was created and had brought in a producing well, he was entitled as of right to a lease on his producing well. The Secretary of the Interior had no authority to refuse such a lease and had no authority to grant a lease for anything beyond the producing well with land adjacent only sufficient for its operation. The President, however, in his discretion, had the right to lease to the claimant the remainder of his claim or to permit the drilling of additional wells by the claimant within the 660 feet; this authority was vested in the President and denied to the Secretary.]

Under section 18a the President was also authorized to direct the compromise and settlement of any controversy as to lands withdrawn under the order of September 27, 1909, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, to be carried out by an exchange or division of land or division of the proceeds.

Section 19 of the leasing act provides for the protection of persons who had made a bona fide claim and expended money, but not brought in a well. This, however, did not apply to lands within the naval reserves.

This sufficiently shows the provisions of the law and policy of the Government as embodied in the leasing act.

WHAT WAS DONE UNDER THE WILSON ADMINISTRATION

The leasing act became effective on February 25, 1920. Prior to this time there had been filed and were pending an enormous volume of claims for locations under the old placer law on lands both within and without the naval reserves, and many suits were pending. Rules and regulations, with a fixed scale of royalties providing for the carrying out of the law, were promptly issued under section 13, and leases were issued under sections 14, 17, and 18. The legal rights of claimants were recognized, and such was the care under which the law was executed that not a single public criticism resulted, notwithstanding the tremendous volume of work imposed upon the Secretary.

NOW AS TO THE NAVAL RESERVES

As to naval reserve No. 1: Not a single claim was allowed, nor a single lease made. It was left intact.

The contrast between the two administrations, aside from the general policy, is shown by the record as to section 36 in this reserve. The title to this 640 acres passed to the State of California with the distinct provision that it contained no minerals. When it was found to contain mineral—oil is mineral—and became part of the naval reserve, the question was whether the title still belonged to the United States. Meantime the Standard Oil Co. had acquired the right of the State of California to the major portion of the section, and the Doheny interests the remainder, and were in possession. In February, 1921, Secretary Payne gave all parties in interest a public hearing, and decided that the title had not passed to the State of California, but remained in the United States; that the Standard Oil Co. and the Doheny interests acquired no title and were wrongly in possession; and Secretary Payne directed the Land Office to make entry accordingly, and made formal written request to the Department of Justice that proceedings be instituted in the courts, and to recover for the United States the land and oil taken out.

After Secretary Fall came in, he reversed this action, withdrew the request made by Secretary Payne to the Department of Justice to proceed against the oil companies, and permitted them to remain in possession.

Due to the Senate investigation, counsel has recently been appointed to sue the oil companies to recover this land, and to do, now, what Secretary Payne directed be done in February, 1921.

This naval reserve No. 1 was therefore left intact.

As to naval reserve No. 2: In this reserve it was found that claimants had brought in about 50 producing wells. These, under the mandatory provision of the leasing act, were leased to the claimants. With the concurrence of the Secretary of the Navy and the President, five offset wells were leased; that is, where it was manifest that private wells had been drilled so near the line of the reserve as to drain the Government oil from the reserve, a well was drilled just within the reserve on a 25 per cent royalty basis, so that the Government would receive the royalty and not permit the private interest to take the oil out without payment of royalty. Another claimant for 540 acres in section 28 was compromised with and given lease on 120 acres.

With these exceptions, naval reserve No. 2 was left intact.

In this reserve the Honolulu Oil Co. claimed title to 17 quarter sections (some 2,000 acres), and applied for a patent. Secretary Payne, after a public hearing, decided the claim invalid and the company not entitled to a patent and denied the same. The only criticism directed against the Wilson administration in the oil matter grew out of this Honolulu decision, and that, of course, came from the oil company and its friends.

As to naval reserve No. 3—the Teapot Dome, Wyo.: All of the claims on this reserve were rejected and no leases made: Among other claimants filed against this reserve was John C. Shaffer, who testified before the Senate committee; he said his claim was later recognized by Secretary Fall, and he was paid some $92,000 by Sinclair.

ACTION OF REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—STRIKING CONTRAST

Within less than three months after the close of the Wilson administration, upon the recommendation of Secretaries Fall and Denby, President Harding issued an Executive order purporting to transfer all of the powers and discretion the law imposed upon the President under the leasing act, and the powers and discretion conferred upon the Secretary of the Navy by the act passed June 4, 1920, to Secretary Fall. How Secretary Fall used this power in disposing of the naval reserves is well known. Whether this Executive order has any validity will be decided by the courts.

As to naval reserve No. 1: Secretary Fall reversed the decision of Secretary Payne as to section 36, and secretly gave that to the Standard Oil Co. and to Doheny, and secretly leased all of the remainder of reserve No. 1 to Mr. Doheny's companies.

In naval reserve No. 2: Where Secretary Payne had leased only the producing wells, Secretary Fall leased claimants their entire claims, and then leased the remainder of the reserve; and as to the 17 quarter sections claimed by the Honolulu Oil Co., which Secretary Payne had held invalid, Secretary Fall reversed to the extent of making the company a lease for the entire 2,000 acres.

As to naval reserve No. 3, which the Wilson administration had left intact, Secretary Fall secretly leased the entire reserve to the Sinclair interests.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] are detained on business of the Senate in the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness. This announcement may stand for the day.

Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I shall not attempt at this time to make any extended statement with reference to what has just been said by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. At another time, perhaps, I may go into detail with reference to certain phases of the whole matter now under discussion. I shall reserve anything I might say now until that later date.

FARM RELIEF

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, was not the clerk proceeding to read the bill for committee amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are no committee amendments. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I had intended to address the Senate briefly upon this bill; but I supposed, from a talk I had with the chairman of the committee, that it would not come to a vote until to-morrow.

Mr. HEFLIN. I note that the chairman of the committee has just come into the Chamber, and I ask what his pleasure is regarding the farm relief bill?

Mr. McNARY. My pleasure would be served if we could have a vote on it to-day; but I am conscious of the fact that there are a number of Senators who want to be heard. I am hoping that we can vote not later than Saturday. The remaining two hours the Senate will be in session this afternoon I hope we can devote to a discussion of the bill. There are three or four Members of the Senate who are prepared to go forward with a discussion of the measure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Where are they? The Chair announced that the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment, and the Senate was about to take a vote when the Senator from Alabama took the floor, evidently to give Senators who desired an opportunity to speak. If there is no one who desires to speak, we shall either have to lay the bill aside and take up something else or go ahead with a vote. I am ready to vote.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, it strikes me that everything has been said about this bill that Senators care to say. Most of the speakers said more about it than they were entirely sure was correct. I do not know why we should not vote on it now.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am advised that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] are prepared to proceed this afternoon.

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York if he has not offered an amendment to the bill, or is he not prepared to offer one?

Mr. COPELAND. I have offered one, and I want to ask action on it at the proper time. My amendment provides for an exemption of either fresh or preserved fruits or vegetables from the operation of the bill. I have reason to hope that the Senator from Oregon will look kindly upon this amendment when the proper time comes to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the situation with reference to the amendment of the Senator from New York to be that the amendment was introduced and printed and is now lying on the table, so that it may be presented by the Senator from New York at any time. He may present it now; and if he presents it now, it will become the pending question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suggest to the Senator that he present it now.

Mr. COPELAND. Will it be agreeable to the Senator from Wisconsin if I present the amendment now, so that it may be before us? That will not interfere at all with the remarks the Senator is about to make.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to yield to have the amendment presented.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that the clerk report the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, line 19, the Senator from New York moves to insert the following after the word "section":

Provided, It is not a fruit or vegetable, in its natural state or processed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from New York does not intend to press the amendment at this time?

Mr. COPELAND. No; but I would be glad if the Senator from Oregon would state his attitude upon the amendment at this time.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when I discussed the bill in the Senate a few days ago I said that in my opinion, and under my construction of the bill, all fruits and vegetables do not come within the fourfolds of the bill. I think perhaps we can work out an amendment covering my view of the matter and perhaps that entertained by the Senator from New York. I want to have an opportunity to read this amendment, to see if it is in the proper place, and an opportunity to confer with others interested in the measure. For that reason only I simply object to the present consideration of the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have no objection at all to the matter going over for the time being, because I know what the attitude of the Senator is, and his desire to exempt the fruit and vegetable producers if it is possible to do so without hazarding the bill. So, before we take final action upon the bill, I shall press this amendment or a similar one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The parliamentary situation is that the amendment has been proposed by the Senator from New York, and the pending question is upon agreeing to it. That does not necessarily mean, however, that the vote will be taken upon it to-day.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I simply want to inquire of the Senator from New York if he has given the bill sufficient scrutiny to be able to say for a certainty that in its present form it does apply to perishable fruits?

Mr. COPELAND. Frankly, I think it does. I know that the Senator from Oregon does not intend that it should, but I am very much disturbed about it, and the fruit and vegetable producers of my State are.

Mr. GLASS. I may say, in this connection, that I have become very much disturbed about it, as the fruit growers of Virginia have been; but the expert of the committee, Doctor Kilgore, prepared for me a memorandum for transmission to the fruit growers of Virginia, which very explicitly contends that the bill in its present form does not apply the equalization fee to perishable fruits. But if there is any doubt about it, I agree with the Senator from New York that it ought to be made very explicit.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator will agree that unquestionably the purpose of the bill is to apply only to nonperishable agricultural products, but it might be argued that if fruits and vegetables are processed or canned, they might become nonperishable. I should have to argue against that proposition. I do think that in order that our constituents may be entirely at rest in their minds we should make provision to exempt them.

I want to say to the Senator from Oregon that he knows I have been very favorable to this legislation, and have voted for the McNary-Haugen bill every time it has been up in the Senate. But it must be made clear that the fruit and vegetable producers are protected. With these products we have an entirely different condition to meet. We can not take possession of apples and tomatoes and other perishable foods and deal with them as we would do with corn or wheat or other products of a nonperishable nature. But, of course, I am confident provision will be made for the garden and orchard products so that nothing will interfere with this important measure looking to the relief of the distressed and badly treated farmer.

Mr. NEELY. I offer an amendment to the pending bill which I intend at the proper time to propose. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to address myself briefly at the outset to the remarks made by the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], as I find them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 2.

I did not interrupt the Senator during the course of his remarks, because I think it is rather unfair to interrupt a political speech of a very prominent candidate for the Presidency. Therefore I concluded that his remarks might well be continuous, and that some attention might be directed to them at some other time.

I find in the course of the remarks of the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] that in discussing the equalization fee contained in the pending measure he undertook to justify that equalization fee upon what I considered to be illogical premises—unjustifiable in fact. I quote from the Senator's remarks as they appear on page 5737 of the RECORD:

For my part, at this time I want to discuss the practical, rather than the legal, principle of the equalization fee. The principle is as old as government itself.

Then he proceeded to point out what he claims to be analogous legislation. I am sure the Senator has misconstrued the legislation he was discussing. I am sure that he is not unfamiliar with legislation in the enactment of which he had a part. I do not believe that he intended to mislead the Senate or the people of the country. But I am sure that if we accept his contention with respect to the equalization fee, then we are to be led into ways of error and the people are to understand that something is to be paid to the farmer instead of the farmer himself paying the equalization fee. In the course of his remarks the Senator from Indiana said:

It is that all beneficiaries of an undertaking shall contribute ratably toward paying the cost. It is new in name only. I can see no difference in its practical effect between the principle involved in the equalization fee and those prevailing in the usual and accepted custom of corporations in their ordinary activities, or the principle employed in local improvements under paving districts, drainage districts, or irrigation districts, or the principles accepted in the Federal reserve act and the transportation act.

He is asking us to believe that the equalization fee is analogous to the benefits which flow from local improvements, such as paving, drainage, and irrigation, but those things which accrue as benefits in the instances he has cited are additions to the principal of the undertaking. They are added capital. They have nothing to do with the question of profits and income. Improvements for street and drainage districts and irrigation districts enhance the value of the project or capital investment and have nothing to do, as I say, with the question of profits; and yet the Senator from Indiana would lead us to believe that this enhancement of the capital value of some particular property is analogous to the equalization fee which is expected to be levied under the pending bill.

Then he referred to the "principle" accepted in the Federal reserve act and at some length proceeded to discuss that. He said:

Under the provisions of the Federal reserve act every national bank is required to be a member of the Federal reserve bank in whose district it is located, and is required to subscribe to the capital stock of its Federal reserve bank in a sum equal to 6 per cent of its paid-in capital stock and surplus. Only one-half of the amount of the subscription, however, is required by law actually to be paid in, the remainder being subject to call when deemed necessary by the Federal Reserve Board.

Here is a subscription to stock which, if a profitable investment, will bear a rate of return. It has no analogy whatever to the principle of the equalization fee. The equalization-fee plan proposes that the farmers shall pay so much in the regulation of interstate commerce for the enhanced price or the inducement to enhance the price of their commodities. It is not an investment from which dividends and profits are to flow, such as are the investments made in the Federal reserve system.

The Senator from Indiana went on to say:

In addition, every member bank of the Federal reserve system is required to maintain reserve balances with its Federal reserve bank.

Those balances are profit producing under certain circumstances. They are not a payment of income and much less a depreciation of the capital of the bank. It is simply another investment and bears no relationship whatever to the character of an equalization fee. The Senator further said:

These are compulsory exactions imposed upon national banks by act of Congress.

Yes; compulsory exactions by which they can make profits by adding to their capital stock, not by paying an equalization fee for the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce.

Again the Senator said:

Under the transportation act the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to prescribe just and reasonable rates in order that carriers may earn a fair return upon the capital invested, and provision is made for disposition of amounts received in excess of what is fixed as a fair return. This likewise is a compulsory exaction.

It is compulsory exaction, but it is a public gratuity that is given to the railroads, entirely unlike the equalization fee which is demanded of the producer of the agricultural commodity. The transportation act in effect guarantees the railroads a return of 6 per cent and the so-called recapture clause, which the Senator from Indiana was discussing, provides:

SEC. 6. If, under the provisions of this section, any carrier receives for any year a net railway-operating income in excess of 6 per cent of the value of the railroad's property held for and used by it in the service of transportation, one-half of such excess shall be placed in a reserve fund established and maintained by such carrier, and the remaining one-half thereof shall, within the first four months following the close of the period for which such computation is made, be recoverable by and paid to the commission for the purpose of adopting and maintaining a general railroad contingent fund as hereinafter described.

There is no analogy and no comparison with respect to the recapture clause of the transportation act and the provisions of the pending measure with respect to the equalization fee. The transportation act says to the railroad company, "After you have received 6 per cent earnings, then one-half of the excess over 6 per cent you shall place in a fund to be used by you for a specific purpose," but the transportation act does not say the Government is going to take that one-half of the excess for any purpose whatsoever. One-half of the balance of the excess is to be placed in a contingent fund out of which the Government may make certain loans, may perform other duties in the purchase of equipment—I shall not go into the details of that—but the result is that under the transportation recapture clause the railroad company does not part with a single dollar permanently. One-half of the excess is for the use of the company itself. The other half goes into a fund which, in my opinion, becomes a trust fund in the interest of the railroad company receiving that excess.

I am directing my remarks to the proposition that there is no analogy between the illustration which the Senator from Indiana has used and that of the equalization fee. I think that ought to be made plain in the course of the debate.

The Senator from Indiana said:

Under the transportation act the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to prescribe just and reasonable rates in order that carriers may earn a fair return upon the capital invested, and provision is made for the disposition of amounts received in excess of what is fixed as a fair return.

He then declared that to be a compulsory exaction similar to the equalization fee. If we would write a farm relief bill giving to the agricultural interests of the country a return of 6 per cent, any excess over that to be reserved for two certain funds as set forth in the transportation act, we would then be doing something for agriculture. The Senator from Indiana has attempted to ground the equalization fee upon fallacious hypotheses and erroneous premises.

Proceeding further—I am quoting now from the remarks of the senior Senator from Indiana—he said:

I am merely seeking to establish these as practically analogous to that provision of the McNary-Haugen bill which requires a ratable contribution to be made by the beneficiaries for the regulation and control of interstate and foreign commerce which this measure seeks to establish.

I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana what rate of contribution do the member banks of the Federal reserve system or do the railroad companies make for the privilege of engaging in banking or in interstate commerce?

Mr. WATSON. I can answer the Senator's question, Mr. President.

Mr. BLAINE. They are guaranteed by law a dividend instead of being compelled to pay an equalization fee. So, Mr. President, if we are to justify the equalization fee upon the principle announced by the Senator from Indiana, I suggest that, so far as he is concerned, he may be fooling himself; but I warn him now that he can not fool the intelligent agricultural citizenship of America through that kind of an argument.

Mr. President, I want to take up in an orderly way some of the factors that make it necessary for Congress to give some heed, to pay some attention, to the question of agricultural depression. That depression arose out of World War conditions. Practically all of the factors are due to war causes. In fact, I assert that all of the important factors that have brought agriculture to its knees arose out of the late war. So I regard agriculture as a war casualty. I think the type of legislation which we should consider is the type that will take care of this casualty due to war.

Agriculture lost its health, it lost its arms, it lost its legs upon which it stood as the result of war, as a victim of war. Therefore it seems to me to be the duty of the Government to make restitution. The Government called upon our young manhood, four and one-half millions of them, in the late war; they were called upon to go, if necessary, across the seas to fight, to make a sacrifice and, if necessary, to die. They performed their obligation according to the call of their Government and they suffered casualties. Agriculture was called upon to produce food and raiment with which to feed and clothe four and a half million men in our Army. Agriculture responded to the call of our Government. Through that response agriculture suffered an injury. Now agriculture is entitled to compensation—adjusted compensation—for the sacrifices it made in behalf of the Government and in response to the call of the President and Congress.

I want briefly to review some of the sacrifices that were made by agriculture in responding to that call. As a result of war there was a tremendous increase of agricultural production. In the years immediately preceding and during the war 40,000,000 acres of pasture land were plowed up and put in crops; 5,000,000 acres of forest were cleared for crops. The call to agriculture was to produce more, and to produce more meant the cultivation of a larger acreage, until we had an increase in the acreage—a sharp and sudden increase—of 45,000,000 acres producing during the war and for war purposes. Improved machinery was demanded, and the farmer was called upon to buy more and more machinery in order to produce more food to feed our Army and the Allies. That stimulated production and called for increased fertilization. So the demand that more food products should be raised in order to supply the needs of the Army and the Allies placed upon agriculture a tremendous demand, to which agriculture responded in full measure.

Another factor contributing to farm depression was the general deflation of the general price level after the war. During the war, especially after America entered the war, in 1917, the price level between agricultural commodities on the farm and wholesale prices of all commodities was almost a dead level. In 1918 the index of prices of agricultural commodities on the farm was 200; the index of wholesale prices of all commodities was 194—very close to a level. In 1919 the index of prices of agricultural commodities on the farm was 209; wholesale prices 206—almost a dead level.

Then, in 1920, the index price of agricultural commodities on the farms dropped to 205, while the index of wholesale prices of commodities increased to 226. In 1921 the index price of agricultural commodities dropped to 116, while the index of wholesale prices of commodities was 147. There was a constant unbalancing in favor of wholesale commodities used upon the farm and by the family upon the farm a constant increase in the price of those commodities, while the price of farm products constantly dropped. That situation arose out of the war. It is true it was a postwar act, due, however, to causes arising because of a war.

Again, arising out of the same situation came increased transportation costs. I have here the joint report of the National Industrial Conference Board and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America. I submit that those two bodies do not represent a soviet of the radicals, or the reds. The conference was made up of business men and bankers. They reported upon the condition of agriculture in the United States, and I shall quote from that report. On page 83 of the report will be found this statement:

> Another harmful consequence of deflation to agriculture was the relative increase in the freight burden of the farmer which it caused.

On page 84 I find this table:

> Index numbers showing changes in railroad freight rates on 50 representative agricultural products, compiled by division of statistical and historical research, United States Department of Agriculture Yearbook, 1926.

In 1914 that index was 99.4. In 1921 it was 117, an increase of nearly 78 per cent in freight charges. In 1918 the index was 117.1; in 1925 it was 157.5, an increase of nearly 60; in percentages, a tremendous increase.

I desire to call attention, in this connection, to four illustrations which demonstrate what the increase in freight rates meant to agriculture. These increases were under the so-called Esch-Cummins law. For my authority I am quoting Professor Boyle, professor of rural economy, New York State College of Agriculture. He says:

> A farmer shipping hay in 1919 paid 10.4 pounds out of each 100 pounds of hay for freight; in 1921—

Note this—

> He paid 20.2 pounds.

Double freight rates under the Esch-Cummins law.

Again:

> A farmer shipping wheat in 1917 paid 3.3 pounds out of each 100 pounds of wheat for freight; in 1922, he paid 9.3 pounds.

Two and one half times as much, almost three times as much, in freight upon his wheat, making a tremendous loss in the amount he received for his wheat.

Another illustration by Doctor Boyle:

> A farmer shipping corn in 1918 paid 7.2 pounds out of each 100 pounds of corn for freight—

Mr. President, I want to call the especial attention of the Corn Belt of the United States to this matter:

> In 1922 he paid 38.6 pounds.

Almost 40 per cent of the amount received for corn in 1922 went toward the payment of freight rates, an increased freight rate of from 7.2 pounds to 38.6 pounds out of every hundred pounds; an increase of 31.4 pounds of corn out of every hundred pounds of corn in freight charges to ship his corn.

This arose out of war. The railroads of this country came to Congress, came to this Government, for relief, and they got it, and that relief was to give them justification for an increase in freight rates; so agriculture became a casualty of war in another respect.

> A farmer shipping potatoes in 1917 paid 4.9 pounds out of each 100 pounds of potatoes for freight; in 1921 he paid 18.3 pounds.

Almost double the amount in the shipment of potatoes; and so, out of the causes of war, these oppressions came upon agriculture.

Turn to another proposition:

There has been pending before Congress and the administration the proposal for a deep waterway from the Lakes to the ocean—a deep waterway capable of carrying ocean-going vessels without change of cargo. Up to this time there have been no practical accomplishments along that line. Had the Government given attention to agriculture, to these fundamental solutions for the difficulties of agriculture, it would not be necessary for agriculture to be begging for relief at this session of Congress. We might have had relief by solving some of the fundamental difficulties that underlie this whole problem of farm deflation. For one, it is my opinion that we never will solve the agricultural problem until we solve some of these fundamental and underlying causes that drove agriculture to its knees.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think it might be well to start in a small way and do as much as we can. We can not make all these changes at once; but if we can pass this relief bill it seems to me it would be a step in the right direction, and give us a start.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I know that it may be proposed that to give the farmer a mite will lull him into a sense of security overnight, perhaps, during an election campaign; but you are not going to satisfy the farmer, and you are not going to satisfy justice, and you are not going to rectify the wrongs done to agriculture, by any temporary relief.

I will get to that very shortly, because I am going to advocate in the course of this debate perhaps the only immediate relief that we can obtain; but I am not going to let the farmers of America believe that these temporizing propositions are going to solve their problem. I do not believe that the farmers of this country should be lulled into a sense of security through acts of Congress, because when the time comes the agricultural interests of this Nation must realize that temporizing with this emergency is only postponing the evil day for agriculture in America, that day when tenantry will be the rule, and there will be in this America but two classes, the toilers and the toil takers.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Republican platform of 1924 says:

> The Republican Party pledges itself to the development and enactment of measures which will place the agricultural interest of America on a basis of economic equality with other industry to insure its prosperity and success.

Does the Senator think the Republican Party can redeem that pledge by any halfway measure or any little thing to start with, and that at the end of the administration, rather than at the beginning of it?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I never took the pledge of the Republican Party very seriously. I do not think there has been an earnest attempt made by the party, as a party, to bring relief to agriculture. I think the majority of the Republican Party, in its official organization, is opposed to farm relief or any relief for agriculture. I am speaking now of the official organization of the Republican Party, as represented by those occupying positions of power in the Republican Party. I even understand that a great majority of the so-called stand-pat or reactionary or Tory Republicans do not believe that there is any such question as a farm question or a farm problem. They brush it aside. It has been brushed aside in Congress. It has been brushed aside in their debates.

Mr. BROOKHART. They did not brush it aside when they wanted the votes of the farmers of the United States, and put this emphatic statement in their platform, pledging themselves to the enactment of legislation for this purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; the plank was all right to get in on, but not to stand on when they got in. That is one reason why I can not be a regular Republican.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator could not be a keynoter.

Mr. BLAINE. No; I could not be a keynoter, and give any praise to the Republican Party for bringing about farm relief, and be telling the truth about it. Keynoting is very easily done. Finely spun phrases can be copied from the books of the orators and repeated from the platforms of national conventions, but they are as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

Talk is cheap, and, putting it in a homely way, it is going to take money to make restitution for the farmers. I want to discuss just briefly this question of transportation from the standpoint of waterways.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is said that in days of Rome when the people got restless, to satisfy them they gave them a circus and a loaf of bread. Does the Senator think that in these modern days it will not be enough to give the people a convention and a keynote?

Mr. BLAINE. And a bone.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator think the people are going to be satisfied with that?

Mr. BLAINE. Not quite. But I am not speaking politically. I do think, however, that the Republican Party owes it to the agricultural interests of America to carry out its pledges. It has too long delayed those pledges, and had there been any greater hope or trust in the Democratic Party, there might have been a different complexion politically in the administration at Washington.

A deep waterway has been promised. I am not going to discuss the deep waterway from the standpoint of its great benefit to the 42,000,000 people located in and about the Great Lakes. I want to call attention, however, to the question of transportation rates as they relate to a deep waterway. Steel moves from Pittsburgh to the Pacific coast ports by water at $15 a ton, while from Chicago mills by rail the same steel pays $25 a ton. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway will add from 7 to 9 cents a bushel to the price of wheat for the wheat growers of America. Flour moves from Seattle to New York by water for $6 per ton. By rail the Minnesota, Dakotas, and Kansas flour producers must pay $8.70 per ton in freight.

Lumber is shipped by water from the Pacific coast to the East at a saving of from $10 to $12 per thousand. First-class freight is shipped from the Pacific coast ports to New York by water, then to Milwaukee, for instance, by rail, for $3.92 per hundred, as compared with $5.10 per hundred from Wisconsin to the Pacific coast by rail. In fact, butter is shipped from far-off New Zealand to the ports of the United States by water almost as cheaply as we can ship butter and other dairy products of our region to the same ports, a distance perhaps one-tenth the distance from New Zealand.

The Mississippi-Warrior service is saving to the agricultural producers an average of $1.75 per ton in freight charges, and yet the Government of the United States pinches every penny that is appropriated to develop and improve the inland waterways.

Millions of dollars are available to build battleships that will become obsolete before the second ship is completed. Congress appropriates millions upon millions of dollars for war, and yet, when it comes to the improvement of our waterways, which will furnish reasonable transportation costs, the Government pinches every coin, unwilling to promote these great undertakings, which, if promoted and encouraged, would enure to the benefit not only of the agricultural producer but as well to all the people of the United States.

Had the inland waterways had the equipment that was denied them, 10,000,000 bushels of wheat would have moved down the Mississippi River to the south in two months in addition to the movements that did occur.

Another factor that arose out of the war was the tariff. I am not going to quote from any free traders or "tariff-for-revenue-onliers"; I want to quote from a conservative report made by conservatives. Their political complexion is not indicated, but it is the report of the National Industrial Conference Board and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America.

That report is dated 1927; it is not an ancient one. Speaking of the tariff, the report states:

> There is little doubt that the steady extension of tariff protection to manufacturing industries, and particularly the increase in the tariff level in postwar years, has on the whole affected agriculture unfavorably in comparison with manufacturing industry. * * *
> It is, however, any increase in duties on manufactured goods, rather than the tariff as such, which is peculiarly harmful to agriculture. If the tariff on those manufactured goods which it seemed desirable to produce in this country had been set at a certain level in the beginning and kept unchanged until it was determined whether or not those industries were able to become self-sustaining, agriculture would not have suffered very greatly. But the increase in rates, step by step, from the Civil War to the World War kept agriculture in a constant process of adjustment. Recovery from one stepping up of the rates could not be attained before another went into effect.

Again let me quote from the same report:

> Like the increase in railroad rates, this raising of the tariff came at a time very inopportune to the farmer.

There was the 1922 tariff act, and there was an emergency tariff act in addition to that.

> Like the increase in railroad rates, this raising of the tariff came at a time very inopportune to the farmer. An increase in the degree of protection, so far as it is real and not a mere raising of rates already completely protective, can not fail to have an adverse effect on some exporting industries, and in the case of the tariff act of 1922 it seems probable that agriculture bore the brunt of this readjustment.

That refers to a readjustment from war conditions. As a result of this situation, we have another factor arising out of the war. There is a decline in domestic consumption. I quote from the same report:

> DECLINE IN DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION
> (1) The declining per capita consumption of certain foods, (2) the substitution of mechanical for animal power, (3) changes in clothing habits and the use of artificial textiles.

That relates to our domestic consumption. Another factor arising out of the war was the decline in the foreign consumption of agricultural products. The Government had loaned money to foreign governments during the war, and made advancements of twenty-five or twenty-six billion dollars, or about that sum. In addition to that, private loans and foreign investments by private interests amount to about $14,000,000,000 at the present time.

America, therefore, has become the creditor nation. She has all the gold, due to war and its devastations and its blighting curse. With millions upon millions of young men who died upon the fields of battle and the starvation which attended the aged, Europe became unable to buy. Our profitable foreign commerce is gone. It is true we have a foreign commerce and a foreign consumption of American products, but with and by a deflated depreciated civilization without money. Our tariff walls are so high that it is impossible for foreign producers to exchange their products for agricultural and other raw materials. All these things grow out of war, so I say that the farmers' condition to-day makes that industry a war casualty.

The great advocate of high protection, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], is not in his seat at this time. If he were, I presume he would rise to suggest that under the 1922 tariff act agricultural implements were placed on the free list, and therefore free trade in the interest of the farmer. Just briefly analyzing such a suggestion, the fact is that the agricultural implements imported into the United States constitute a mere fraction of the total agricultural implements used by the farmers of the United States.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BLAINE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I think the facts are that our manufacturers of farm machinery manufacture more than they can use here at home and therefore export.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; I shall give the figures in just a moment. I thank the Senator. He is correct.

In 1923 the importations of agricultural implements were only $2,327,956. Any 10 first-class counties of the United States could absorb all of the imported manufactured farm machinery. But the year preceding—I have not the figures for the same year—the production of farm machinery in the United States by American industry amounted to $334,951,000. Clearly the importation of a little more than $2,000,000 of farm machinery would have no appreciable effect on the cost of farm machinery to the farmer. Moreover, all of the material that goes into the manufacture of agricultural machinery, especially the steel and iron, bear a high tariff rate, so that as a matter of fact the benefits to the farmer of free agricultural implements are almost nothing.

The results growing out of the war—results entirely due to war—therefore have brought the agricultural interests almost to a state of economic slavery. Tenancy is increasing at a tremendous rate. Interest rates have been higher. Land mortgages are constantly pyramiding. Referring to Professor Boyle again as the authority for my statement, I call to the attention of the Senate the fact that from 1910 to 1920 the mortgage debt on farms operated by owners increased from $2,778,000,000 to $5,444,000,000, or a net increase of $3,166,000,000. The interest on this sum was an average rate of 6.1 per cent. Therefore the interest burden alone upon this indebetedness for one year was $193,000,000. For the years 1920 to 1925 there occurred a still further increase in the size of the farmer's mortgage debt.

Mr. President, through the stimuli of war, promoted by the Government through its constituted officials, the agricultural conditions in America can be traced to that one single cause—war.

For the purpose of the RECORD I desire to have inserted therein, without reading, some tables which I have compiled, one relating to imports into the United States of raw and manufactured animal and vegetable products by groups of commodities for the years 1925–26 and 1926–27; also other tables in relation to the United States exports in specified commodities expressed as a percentage of approximate world net exports and principal agricultural exports of the United States, rather in detail, and the relative percentage with relation to the total exports of various farm commodities.

AGRICULTURE EXPORTS

The significance of an export is not to be measured directly by the percentage of the total volume exported. The significance of the percentage of a product exported is to be found mainly in the indication of the change in production or domestic consumption necessary to eliminate the exportable surplus. The more significant fact is that as long as we export any part of a product that part determines the relation of our domestic markets to the foreign markets for all of the product that our producers have for sale at home and abroad. It places our producers in the position of having to take for all of the product what purchasers in foreign markets will pay for any part of the product, less cost or charges for transporting it from the producers to the foreign purchasers.

* * * * * * *

Of some commodities the quantity which we export is such a large part of the total international trade in the product that it is an important factor in determining the relation of the United States production to the world markets. NOTES ON AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

Among the dried fruits, apples, prunes, and raisins gained in exports. The statistics given do not include the dried fruits, but rather the fresh fruit. However, prunes are listed under the dried fruits, but are not listed in the statistics consulted under fresh fruits.

Trade between the continental United States and Alaska, Porto Rico, and Hawaii is considered in the customs returns as domestic trade, and the statistics, therefore, are not included with the regular export statistics.

About 90 per cent of the products of the farmers of the United States market is directly affected by foreign competition, either in foreign markets to which we export some part of our products or in the domestic markets into which we import some part of what we consume. Some of our great staple commodities, such as wheat and cotton, are sold in all the principal markets of the world in competition with foreign production. Other important commodities, such as wool and hides, enter the United States from all parts of the world and compete in our markets with domestic production. The producers of many of our minor crops, such as onions, prunes, and hemp, are just as much affected by foreign competition as are those of our more important staple crops. In all such cases the prices of our products are determined in part by the volume and quality of the foreign production. (World Production versus American Production of Agricultural Products, O. C. Stine.)

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have not undertaken to set forth in any great detail and by no means in an all-inclusive way the causes of the present agricultural depression. I have undertaken to call attention to some of the main causes. I think there is justification in coming to the conclusion that the present condition of agriculture is one which constitutes an emergency. I am not convinced that the measure pending before us is going to solve the problem as an emergency. As a permanent solution of the problem I am convinced that it does not meet the situation.

I think it is temporizing with the present condition. I do not say nor do I advocate that the pending measure should not be adopted. I believe there is a general feeling throughout the agricultural regions of our country that the measure will afford some relief. It may; I do not believe that it will do any harm; but, as I view the situation, we are not going to solve this problem until we get at the very root of the causes of the inflation that exists to-day with respect to manufactured articles and at the same time reach the root of the cause of the present deflation in agricultural prices. I think the facts are fairly well known. If we can take the inflation out of railroad stocks; if we can transport our goods at a rate that will yield a return to the railroads based upon the service that the railroads should render and upon the valuation of the railroads, fixed upon the basis of the actual prudent investment of capital in the railroads; if we will undertake a revision of the tariff law, and if we only go so far in revising the tariff law as to provide for reciprocal commodity trading as between foreign production and agricultural products in America, we will then begin to find a remedy for the present situation.

Expressing the whole issue in one word, I think the cause of agriculture's plight to-day is privilege; and until remedies are provided to destroy privilege, whether it is privilege arising through a high protective tariff, arising through banking laws, arising through an inequitable system of taxation, or any other form of privilege, we shall not have solved the problem of those who produce the raw material intended to feed, clothe, and sustain human life.

Mr. President, as I view the situation we may enact legislation at this session of Congress that will be of temporary benefit to the agricultural producers. I am willing to support that character of legislation; but I am willing to support it only on the condition that it will not be the end of the fight for economic justice for agriculture. I am unwilling to support any temporizing legislation designed to mislead the men and women back upon the 6,000,000 or more farms of America. I want it understood that, so far as I am concerned, in supporting these measures I am willing to let them be tried out. However, I do not want the farmers of America to understand, so far as anything that I may say is concerned, that the measures before the Senate are a solution of the farm problem. I hope that they will afford some relief; I believe they will; but with that view I hold to the opinion I have expressed, that the farmer's present condition and the condition in which he has found himself since the close of the World War is an emergency and that the condition of agriculture is a casualty arising from war and out of war, and that the Government of the United States should make restitution so far as it is possible.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], as I understand that amendment, does propose restitution, at least to some extent. It proposes to appropriate $600,000,000, as I understand, to pay the losses, if there shall be any, of an export corporation or organization designed to buy for foreign trade the surpluses of farm commodities. I do not regard that $600,000,000 as a subsidy; I do not regard it as a dole. I would not accept it as a dole or a subsidy; I would not accept the amendment if it were designed to be final. However, there is a limitation expressed within the amendment itself. That limitation is, as I understand, that it shall remain in effect only so long as there is left any part of the $600,000,000 available for the proposed export organization, and when that period is reached, when the time comes when there is no more money available, then the measure ceases to be effective and some other plan, either an excise plan or an equalization plan, is proposed, but not written into the amendment, to be effective at the end of the period to which I have referred. However, as I understand from the Senator from Iowa, the $600,000,000 may afford the opportunity for making restitution; it may afford the opportunity for meeting the existing emergency, for paying for this war casualty.

I do not mean that the $600,000,000 is going to pay the losses of agriculture incurred since the forced deflation of agricultural products in 1920 and 1921; but it is proposed by the amendment to step in and say to the farmer, "We propose, so far as possible, to engage in the export business in order to dispose of surplus commodities, and we have set up $600,000,000 to cover the loss in the transaction of that business, if there shall be any loss."

I think the sum might well be more. As I said at the outset, Congress in the twinkling of an eye has passed through—at least the Senate has, and so has the House—appropriation measures carrying millions of dollars. Congress came to the relief of the railroads and gave them nearly half or more than half a billion dollars. Congress, through the act creating the Shipping Board, came to the aid of water transportation, to the aid of those engaged in transportation upon the oceans, and sold ships built by the Government at Government expense at hundreds of millions of dollars less than the ships cost the Government, thus giving gratuities to the shipowners purchasing those ships.

It was only the other day that within a period of two hours the Senate passed a bill appropriating $325,000,000 for flood relief to meet an emergency—a bill carrying not only the amount I have mentioned but, as well, proposing a plan which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], as I understand, admitted might cost three-quarters of a billion dollars, and perhaps a billion of dollars before it could be completely carried out. Am I correct in that?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I was reading a proposed bill, and did not catch what the Senator was saying until I heard him mention my name.

Mr. BLAINE. I suggested that the bill relating to flood control carried $325,000,000 for expenditure within the next few years; that the plan proposed, however, might cost three-fourths of a billion dollars, even running into a billion dollars.

Mr. JONES. No; the Senator is wrong with reference to that. The statement I made was this:

The bill authorizes $325,000,000 to carry out the project from Cairo down, which is the project adopted in the bill. I did state that possibly the project might cost $500,000,000, but I doubt if it will cost anything more than that.

I did say this, however: Surveys are provided in the bill for the purpose of ascertaining the possible projects that may hereafter be recommended to Congress; and these, of course, are subject to adoption or rejection by Congress. They are not adopted in this bill. They are not part of the project adopted in this bill. They will be new projects if adopted. If Congress should embark upon the policy of reservoirs and these additional projects, then, of course, the ultimate cost of such projects might be a billion dollars, and might even be more.

I am glad to have an opportunity to make that plain—that the bill that we passed only obligates us to take care of the floods from Cairo down, and that in my judgment, as I expressed it on the floor then, this will cost not more than $500,000,000. Any additional cost will come from the adoption of additional or new projects by the Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's explanation. It does not change the purport of my prediction. There is already authorized by the Senate at least the expenditure of $325,000,000. If certain plans are carried out, as the Senator explained, that may mount to a billion dollars. Of course, it will require future acts of Congress.

Mr. President, that was an emergency. I supported that measure. The people of the Mississippi Valley, their future, their lives, were threatened by a repetition of the calamity that overcame them. So in the present instance we are meeting or endeavoring to meet this emergency. A calamity has befallen agriculture. That calamity arose out of the demands of the Nation, and through no fault of agriculture, but through the farmer's response to the patriotic urge and the demand of his Government.

It has been proposed, as I understand, by the Secretary of the Navy that we enter upon a $4,000,000,000 Navy program; and a bill has already passed the House providing for an appropriation of $275,000,000 for the construction of cruisers and certain other warcraft—an incomplete measure, because it is proposed to follow that up with other proposals and additional appropriations.

Here is agriculture, with 30,000,000 of people depending upon the soil, baffled by the weather, threatened at planting season and at harvest with the destruction of the result of their toil, subject to the manipulation of speculators in the markets of the world, having no control of the price they receive for their commodity, and no control of the price they must pay for their necessities. It is an emergency. The farmer, I repeat, is a casualty as the result of war. Six hundred million dollars is a stingy amount for this great Government to offer in making restitution. It may be the best we can do. I doubt if those who are opposed to farm relief would yield in their opposition to this proposal to make restitution.

I say, Mr. President, that this proposal of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is not a subsidy. It is not a dole. It is only a small recognition by the Government of the United States, if Congress enacts the amendment into law, of the losses borne by agriculture; only a small fraction of the restitution that the Government should make to agriculture.

ATTITUDE OF ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Chicago Tribune of March 18, 1928. It dwells upon the utter indifference exhibited by the Anti-Saloon League to the infamous scandals engendered by the Harding administration so long as the public men who were responsible for those scandals were subservient to its influence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF THE ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE

Warren G. Harding, Senator from Ohio, was nominated as the Republican candidate for President June 13, 1920. His State was the home of the Anti-Saloon League. The candidates he defeated were known to be heads above him in qualifications, but a combination of fellow Senators gathered up 692 votes for him on the tenth ballot and he was nominated over Wood, Lowden, and Johnson.

This was a year after prohibition became effective. The Ohio gang was a hard-drinking, poker-playing outfit amenable to the Anti-Saloon League for political policy and in other respects out on the make. With the inauguration of Harding the gang moved to Washington and the little green house on K street was opened. The Anti-Saloon League also moved its high command to Washington and opened its congressional and administrative control office.

Harding appointed Harry Daugherty, of Ohio, as Attorney General. That brought in his brother Mel, his friend Jesse Smith, Smith's divorced wife, Roxie Stinson, Gaston B. Means, Charles Cramer, Charles Forbes, Col. Thomas W. Miller, and others who later were to furnish suicides, scandals, and jailbirds.

The Ohio prohibitionists, having moved in, proceeded to assume control of prohibition enforcement. John F. Kramer, first prohibition commissioner, resigned to become an Anti-Saloon League lecturer. One Ohio faction wanted to put Newton Fairbanks, a small town (Ohio) editor, in charge of enforcement, but the more influential Ohio section, with Wayne B. Wheeler, as its man of large consequence, wanted the job for Roy A. Haynes and through Wheeler he got it. Wheeler and Frank B. Willis, of Ohio, were friends. Willis had put Harding in nomination at Chicago. He had been governor. He later was to go to the Senate. He is now Harding's successor as Ohio's candidate for President and he is completely subservient to the Anti-Saloon League, a hundred per center for league control.

Mr. Harding's private supply of liquor also was moved to Washington and more was procured. One prominent national Republican was soon describing himself as the official bootlegger to the White House, and even beer by the keg could be recommended as very good. Cocktail hour in the White House was a part of the ceremony. Mr. Wheeler, then general counsel of the Anti-Saloon League, now dead, was recognized as dominant in Congress and the administration for all purposes in which he cared to assert himself. Some Members of Congress earned money, dignified as honorarium, for speeches for the league.

Albert Fall, of New Mexico, had been appointed Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Fall had been in the Senate with Mr. Harding. Less than three months after the new Secretary took his place an Executive order transferred the naval oil reserves, including Teapot Dome and Elk Hills, to the Department of the Interior.

Six months after the transfer the Continental Trading Co., a Canadian corporation, was organized and on that day it bought and sold 33,000,000 barrels of oil. It bought at $1.50 a barrel and sold at $1.75, a profit of $8,000,000, some part of which is lost in ambiguity. But $3,080,000 is known to have been actually realized and invested in Liberty bonds, some of which were held as a political working fund.

In April, 1922, the Teapot Dome reserve was leased by Secretary Fall to the Mammoth Oil Co., a Sinclair corporation, and Elk Hills to the Pan American Oil Co., belonging to Edward L. Doheny. This brief summary is given merely to show the rapidity with which the system of corruption was organized and put in action with a war chest full of millions procured through the astonishing Continental Trading Co.

It is not yet known where all that money went. For parallels to the corruption it is necessary to go back to the debt assumption scandals of the early Republic, to the Yazoo land deals, to the Credit Mobilier. Fall received Liberty bonds traced to the Continental Co. In all he received $230,000 worth. He also had a "loan" of $100,000 from Doheny. The Continental deal did not come to a disclosure until September, 1924, and at this moment the Senate investigating committee is trying to trace the disbursement of money used to influence political action, pay for acts of corruption, and to control the Republican Party.

Out of the still obscured picture have come flashes of Will Hays, chairman of the national committee which managed Harding's campaign, peddling Sinclair's Liberty bonds from the Continental fund to cover the oil stain on the contributions. Mr. Hays was worried by the campaign deficit and more worried in the uneasy possession of the money Sinclair gave him to meet it. He was hunting Republicans to take the bonds in $50,000 packages, give him their own checks to hide the source, and reimburse themselves by selling the bonds. The summary of events shows the quick work of the oil conspirators, but the evidence is not yet complete to reveal when the deals had their beginning or what all their conditions were.

Through all this and other scandal the Anti-Saloon League control of Government was complaisant. To the league a good government was one which made sumptuary regulation paramount, which encouraged judicial overthrow of citizenship rights, which extended abuses of search and seizure, which sought extremes of punishment. The bargain was one of subservience on one side and condoning on the other. Rascals in politics could deliver themselves to the league and gain immunity for their outrages against public probity and governmental honor.

Under such patronage the scandals of Washington and of Government agencies waxed, fattened, and then exploded. Fall, Sinclair, and the Dohenys, senior and junior, were indicted. The oil leases were annulled for fraud. There were the scandals of the surplus Army goods, of the Standard Aircraft case, of the American Metals case, in which Daugherty, Smith, King, and Miller were indicted. Harry Daugherty and his brother Mel refused to testify before the Senate committee. Harry Daugherty was found to have burned all the books of the Midland National Bank, of Washington Courthouse, Ohio, where Jesse Smith had an account.

The little green house in K street was discovered for the public. Jesse Smith shot himself in Daugherty's apartment at the Wardman Park Hotel. Space permits only a sketching of the progress of fraud and violence across the scene, but names in themselves are sufficient to revive the recollection of the most dismaying episodes in national history: Gaston B. Means, Roxie Stinson, Charles Cramer (who committed suicide), Charles Forbes, Forbes of the Veterans' Bureau. He was an intimate of Harding, Daugherty, et al. He was given direction of the hospitalization of the country's wounded soldiers, and entered upon a career of fraud which was an outrage to the helpless victims of war as well as theft of public money. He and John W. Thompson, another conspirator, went to prison for this.

We say that these scandals which ruined the reputation of a government and nearly discredited the Republican Party were under the patronage of the Anti-Saloon League. It was more than a coincidence that prohibition enforcement as conducted by the supergovernment and this political corruption were timed as they were.

The Anti-Saloon League was in self-asserted custody of public morals. It maintained a single standard by which public men acquired merit or were hounded out of office. This single standard took no account of political morals or public conduct. It required only that the person having or seeking public office deliver himself on the point of prohibition and further no questions were asked. This easily gained virtue was a cloak for rascality and was used as such. The league would use its money to ruin a public man unless he subscribed and complied and it would use the thunder of the pulpit to destroy his character unless he did. No thunder was directed against the political crook. He was spotless if he was professedly dry. The Ohio gang proved that it was not necessary to be personally dry. Delivery in public to the purposes of the league was all that was necessary. The league thus encouraged the development of unbounded rascality, which under the dry totem could preserve the outward appearance of righteousness. There was only one law which required service to gain league approval.

The secret of this had been found in Ohio, where the mask of morality could be put on to cover anything. It not only went to Washington, but it spread out in the neighboring States. The single standard of public conduct protected Small and FRANK SMITH in Illinois. The Illinois Anti-Saloon League made a perfect example of it when, with all the facts of SMITH'S public misconduct spread before it, he was indorsed, supported, and elected to the United States Senate, only to be turned back at the door.

He had been proved unfit to have an office of trust and responsibility. His financial relations with the utilities which he controlled as chairman of the Illinois commerce commission were admitted and known and no organization of citizens with any respect for probity in public office could have supported him for the United States Senate. But the Anti-Saloon League did. It swallowed his public conduct and it refused to support another dry, a man of character and ability, because it thought SMITH had the better chance to win. That was the complete test.

This despicable opportunism was a complete revelation of the indifference of the league to decent public conduct. It was an avowal that what public men did was immaterial if they would deliver themselves and their votes to the league for its enforcement of a single law. In controlling or trying to control the Illinois Legislature the league has made this single test of fitness. Rascality was of no consequence.

This has been the case in Indiana, where Shumaker, of the league, and Stephenson, of the klan, ruled the State, the league indifferent to everything except the clamping of abusive and tyrannous law on the citizens, who, under the joint domination, were reduced to abjectness and intolerance or timidity of opinion until Shumaker worked himself into a sentence for contempt of the supreme court and Stephenson was convicted of murder and sent to the penitentiary for life.

The indifference of the league to standards of public and private conduct was shown when it accepted $500,000 from Sebastian Kresge and retained it when evidence in a divorce trial revealed that the donor's life was smirched in the very particulars in which the moralists of the organization propose to regulate citizenship. It was revealed in the support and protection given William H. Anderson, state superintendent in New York, convicted of third-degree forgery in connection with his handling of money collections. It was shown again in the attempted suppression of the evidence in Kansas showing that league funds collected under Supt. Fred L. Crabbe had been paid to Justice Richard J. Hopkins of the State supreme court and to Attorney General Charles B. Griffith. These and other offenses against public dignity and probity have been without scruple.

The outrages in national and State administration against the decencies of government and of public life, against the rights of citizens and the principles of American society, these discredits to the American reputation and stains on American honor have been under the patronage of the Anti-Saloon League. They have had the indulgence of the zealous supporters of Volstead. What asserts itself to be the dominant idea of morality in the United States passes on the other side of the road. Its patronage protects corruptionists.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

LATEST EFFORT TO "GET" WHEELER—BUTTE MINER, ORGAN OF CLARK COPPER INTERESTS, SUPPRESSES STORY OF MONTANA PROGRESSIVE'S FIGHT FOR COAL MINERS

The American people usually come to pretty sound conclusions on the facts—when they can get the facts. But they can hardly form sound judgments on things which they are not allowed to know.

Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, of Montana, is one of the ablest men of the Senate. He has been doing superb work in the probe of conditions in the mining camps of Pennsylvania. His knowledge of mining facts, as well as his native wit, enabled him, as a member of the Senate's investigating committee, to bring out the rottenness of the situation so plainly that neither doubt nor argument was possible.

Senator WHEELER lives at Butte, Mont. Butte is a mining town. Half of the grown men in the place are or have been miners. Nothing in the world would interest them more than the story of their Senator's brave fight to end the exploitation of the coal diggers of western Pennsylvania. The Associated Press carried a pretty good account of the affair.

But the Butte Miner, newspaper organ of the Clark copper interests in Montana, on several days during which this was the most interesting item of telegraphic news, did not publish a line of the story and did not even mention Senator WHEELER'S name!

The copper crowd are trying to drive WHEELER out of public life. They do not dare print the facts concerning his work in Washnigton. Hence this "silent treatment."

Labor has too much respect for the workers of Butte to believe they can be misled by such despicable tactics. Fortunately, they are not entirely dependent on the Miner for information concerning the doings of their public servants. They will get facts, and unless Labor misses its guess, next November they will give Senator WHEELER the overwhelming vote of confidence he so richly deserves.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 6, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, April 5, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who didst not spare Thine only begotten Son, we would not implore Thee to withhold from us the valley of pain. There can not be an affliction so heavy nor an emergency so desperate but we shall have the support of the Father's hand. The world has seen every prospect blasted and consumed. In the garden, beneath a sky palled with tragedy, the Savior is at the portal to tread the wine press alone. The moment is hushed. Toil! Tears! Night! O God forgive the iniquity of us all. We thank Thee that the seed time of suffering will become the glorious harvest. In the valley of our sorrow Thou wilt help us to rise to the bright mount of prayer. Every life must have its Gethsemane. May we learn its lesson, acquire its discipline, and even kiss the chastening rod that smites us. In that hour of our weeping may the angels who comforted the Master whisper words of love and courage and minister peace. O He who knocked at the door of our hearts and gave blessing; the One who stretched His arms to us when we were burdened, saying, "Come unto me"; the One who stood by us in every dark hour, when the waves ran high and the night was dark. O this is the Christ who shall be our King and our Lord, and in the sunshine of whose face we shall abide forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. Under special order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] for 10 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under date of March 19, last, I addressed a communication to the Secretary of State, and directed his attention to the fact that the Kingdom of Rumania was about to negotiate a loan of $60,000,000 from New York bankers and bankers abroad; that at that time negotiations were afoot with the New York banking house of Blair & Co. and with the Federal reserve bank in the city of New York. I called the attention of the Secretary further to the fact that Rumania, running true to its history, had made of itself during the last few years, as a result of pogroms and massacres of and excesses against minority populations, a pariah among the nations of the earth. That we in America stood aghast at the recent atrocities at Jassy, Kishineff, Bucharest—outrages which we thought the postwar treaties had ended forever. I called his attention to the fact that Rumania, because of her actions, stood condemned in the world of public opinion. I called attention further to the fact that Rumania had been an old offender against the rights of minorities, and that the great British statesman, Disraeli, away back in 1878, as the price of Rumania's admission into the concert of nations, had demanded that Rumania safeguard the rights of minorities in the Treaty of Berlin. I directed his attention to the difficulties that Secretary of State Hay had with Rumania in 1902, when he remonstrated with that Government and indicated that the United States could not be a tacit party to such an international wrong and that it was constrained to protest against the treatment to which the religious minorities of Rumania had been subjected, not alone because it has unimpeachable ground to remonstrate against the resultant injury to itself—but in the name of humanity.

For better understanding of the situation I herewith refer to said letter appearing at the end of these remarks.

I recalled to Mr. Kellogg that in December, 1926, I invited his attention to the excesses then going on in Rumania, and I indicated that he had the right of protest. He replied that the treaty of Versailles had set up a tribunal where religious and racial minorities might bring their grievances, but that inasmuch as we had not become a signatory to the treaty, we could not remonstrate. I thought and so replied that the tribunal of the Council of the League of Nations was not an exclusive tribunal; that just as Secretary of State Hay in 1902 protested, we had a right, if only on grounds of high morality, to protest. I furthermore said that although there was no jurisdiction to protest in 1926, at least now the Secretary had jurisdiction to interdict at least the loan to Rumania. It has been the policy of the Secretary of State—and there are grave doubts as to the legality of that policy—to sanction or disapprove applications for loans to foreign governments and foreign countries. Embargoes have been placed against France, Italy, and Belgium, as well as Russia. They were lifted as against Italy and Belgium when they settled their debts, but the ban still is in force against France. The Secretary of State said that he would proscribe loans to those countries where the money was to be used to build up monopolies of raw materials which we import, where the money was to be used for armament purposes, and where the debts owing to us from those countries had not been settled.

Does not the Secretary of State—with doubtful legality, of course—indirectly censor the action of foreign governments when he says that those loans shall not be granted; when he says Russia shall have no money because we disagree with its form of government, which repudiated its debts; does he not seek to influence the internal policy of that country? The conclusion is inescapable, and the question must be answered in the affirmative; and thus the Secretary of State becomes in a way a censor of foreign countries. If he would sanction a loan to Rumania, he would indirectly be putting the imprimatur of approval of his department upon the conduct of Rumania, a country which, as I said before, had made itself a pariah among nations.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is it not a question of whether or not the people who are making the loans in this country should not be warned?

Mr. CELLER. I will say that Blair & Co. and all who participate in that loan are doing a grievous wrong, and in my humble way I shall do everything in my power to prevent every fair-minded man and woman in this country from investing money in loans that will be used by that most medieval of nations, the Kingdom of Rumania. I shall point out that the money may even be used to further the very excesses we inveigh against.

Now, we are told that the American committee on religious minorities made a report, for example, that gives a most depressing picture of conditions in that benighted country, and shows that Lutherans, Baptists, Roman Catholics, and Jews are the—victims of an excited nationalism directly stimulated or connived at by a majority of the ruling classes.

The committee said further:

That minority rights stipulated in the peace treaties by which the new Rumania came into being are inscribed in the constitution but are largely violated in practice. Patriotic "defense" organizations, animated by religious or racial hatred, are sanctioned by the Government. The old pre-war policies of Russification against many subject races of the Czars, of Germanification against the Poles, are now in force, and with a ruthlessness of procedure that the old methods did not always attain. In the universities, in the schools and courts of law, in various fields of administration, the investigators found a state of inequity which moves it to speak out with a vigor that refuses to take account of international "etiquette."

The Secretary of State replied to me under date of March 23, and said that up to that day no application had been presented to him for a loan to Rumania or for his approval. The letter follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 23, 1928.

The Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CELLER: I have received your letter of March 19, 1928, in which you state that it is rumored in New York financial circles that the Rumanian Government is negotiating for an international loan of $60,000,000, the greater portion of which will be obtained in the United States. You refer to the department's policy with reference to foreign loans and request that the department disapprove of any financing in the Ameriman market on behalf of the Rumanian Government because of the occurrence of anti-Semitic disturbances in Rumania.

In reply I beg to inform you that the department has not been consulted in connection with the loan negotiations to which your letter refers.

In this connection I take pleasure in inclosing for your information a copy of the department's press statement of March 3, 1923, with reference to the flotation of foreign loans in the United States. It will be noted that the controlling factor in determining the department's policy with reference to specific loans is the question of whether or not the proposed financing involves national interests. As you are aware, Rumania concluded a debt-funding agreement with the Government of the United States on December 4, 1925.

There is also inclosed for your information the text of my address of December 14, 1925, made at a dinner of the Council on Foreign Relations. Pages 16 and 17 contain my remarks with reference to foreign loans.

I am, my dear Mr. CELLER,
Sincerely yours,

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

(Inclosures (2): Press statement dated March 3, 1923; copy of address of December 14, 1925.)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
March 3, 1922.

FLOTATION OF FOREIGN LOANS

At a conference held last summer between the President, certain members of the Cabinet, and a number of American investment bankers, the interest of the Government in the public flotation of issues of foreign bonds in the American market was informally discussed and the desire of the Government to be duly and adequately informed regarding such transactions before their consummation, so that it might express itself regarding them if that should be requested or seem desirable was fully explained. Subsequently the President was informed by the bankers that they and their associates were in harmony with the Government's wishes and would act accordingly.

The desirability of such cooperation, however, does not seem sufficiently well understood in banking and investment circles.

The flotation of foreign bond issues in the American market is assuming an increasing importance, and on account of the bearing of such operations upon the proper conduct of affairs it is hoped that American concerns that contemplate making foreign loans will inform the Department of State in due time of the essential facts and of subsequent developments of importance. Responsible American bankers will be competent to determine what information they should furnish and when it should be supplied.

American concerns that wish to ascertain the attitude of the department regarding any projected loan should request the Secretary of State, in writing, for an expression of the department's views. The department will then give the matter consideration and, in the light of the information in its possession, endeavor to say whether objection to the loan in question does or does not exist; but it should be carefully noted that the absence of a statement from the department, even though the department may have been fully informed, does not indicate either acquiescence or objection. The department will reply as promptly as possible to such inquiries.

The Department of State can not, of course, require American bankers to consult it. It will not pass upon the merits of foreign loans as business propositions, nor assume any responsibility whatever in connection with loan transactions. Offers for foreign loans should not, therefore, state or imply that they are contingent upon an expression from the Department of State regarding them, nor should any prospectus or contract refer to the attitude of this Government. The department believes that in view of the possible national interests involved it should have the opportunity of saying to the underwriters concerned, should it appear advisable to do so, that there is or is not objection to any particular issue.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Was that in March of the present year?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; in March of the present year. But while there seems to be no application filed with the Secretary, the New York Herald and Tribune this morning publishes a dispatch from Bucharest which seems to indicate that a loan had been concluded for $80,000,000, although Blair & Co., replying to the Herald and Tribune, said that in so far as they knew the loan had not been concluded. But it was admitted that plans for the loan are being carefully studied at the offices of the firm.

I submit, therefore, gentlemen, that there is a grave probability that the loan will be concluded probably with or without the consent of the Secretary of State. But I am sure that Blair & Co. and the Federal reserve bank in New York will not risk making that loan without the consent of the Secretary of State.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I want to ask the gentleman if it has been the course of the financial institutions to make loans to foreign countries except with the consent of their own Government? Could the gentleman cite a case where that was done?

Mr. CELLER. Pursuant to the policy enunciated by the State Department every banker, so far as I have been able to discover, has first sought the permission of the Secretary of State before making a loan; so I think the Rumanian application will soon find its way to the desk of the Secretary of State, and I fervently hope that the Secretary of State will take into consideration the conditions that have prevailed in Rumania for the last few years and proscribe this proposed loan.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Is it not a fact that the Kingdom of Rumania has recently defaulted on a short-term note of £5,000? If they can not pay that money, how are they going to pay back the $60,000,000?

Mr. CELLER. I thank the gentleman for the information.

The recital of excesses in Rumania reads like a page of the darkest misdeeds of medieval times. Here, therefore, is an opportunity for us to give some sort of help. We can say to Rumania first rehabilitate yourself in the eyes of the world, first redeem yourself and give the strongest assurances that your offense will not recur—then, and only then, shall we lend financial help.

In Rumania there is oppression and there is misery. Must we not help?

In conclusion, permit a reference to two stanzas of James Russell Lowell's poem entitled "Freedom":

Is true freedom but to break
Fetters for our own dear sake,
And, with leathern hearts, forget
That we owe mankind a debt?
No! true freedom is to share
All the chains our brothers wear,
And, with heart and hand, to be
Earnest to make others free!

They are slaves who fear to speak
For the fallen and the weak;
They are slaves who will not choose
Hatred, scoffing, and abuse,
Rather than in silence shrink
From the truth they needs must think;
They are slaves who dare not be
In the right with two or three.

[Applause.]

Under leave to extend my remarks I insert the following letters from the Secretary of State to myself under date of January 11, 1927; my rejoinder to him of January 13, 1927; my letter of March 19, 1928; letter to John Sullivan, Esq., president of New York State Federation of Labor, March 26, 1928, and his reply of March 29, 1928:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 11, 1927.

The Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CELLER: I am in receipt of your letter dated December 31, 1926, in which you refer to the recent alleged mistreatment of the Jews in the cities of Kishineff, Kalrash, Jassy, and Bucharest.

Your letter contains excerpts from Secretary of State Hay's circular instruction of August 11, 1902, to the American diplomatic representatives at Paris, Berlin, London, Rome, Petrograd, and Constantinople. This circular instruction reproduces part of an instruction of July 17, 1902, to Mr. Wilson, at the time minister to the Balkan States. The text of this latter instruction is to be found on pages 910–914 of the Foreign Relations of the United States for 1902. For your convenient reference I inclose herewith copies of both instructions.

You will note that the instruction to Mr. Wilson deals with two matters:

1. The negotiation of a naturalization convention with Rumania.
2. Certain aspects of the then existing immigration problem.

The relationship between the instruction of July 17, 1902, and the circular of August 11, 1902, is indicated in the first and second paragraphs of the latter.

In your letter you suggest that what was said in 1902 by Secretary of State Hay may readily be said by me at this time. The status of minorities in Rumania, however, appears to have undergone considerable change since 1902. A treaty between the principal allied and associated powers and Rumania, signed at Paris on December 9, 1919, guarantees the rights of these minorities in Rumania. Article 12 of that treaty is as follows:

"Rumania agrees that the stipulations in the foregoing articles, so far as they affect persons belonging to racial, religious, or linguistic minorities, constitute obligations of international concern and shall be placed under the guaranty of the League of Nations. They shall not be modified without the assent of a majority of the council of the League of Nations. The United States, the British Empire, France,

Italy, and Japan hereby agree not to withhold their assent from any modification in these articles which is in due form assented to by a majority of the council of the League of Nations.

"Rumania agrees that any member of the Council of the League of Nations shall have the right to bring to the attention of the council any infraction or any danger of infraction of any of these obligations, and that the council may thereupon take such action and give such direction as it may deem proper and effective in the circumstances.

"Rumania further agrees that any difference of opinion as to questions of law or fact arising out of these articles between the Rumanian Government and any one of the principal allied and associated powers or any other power, a member of the Council of the League of Nations, shall be held to be a dispute of an international character under article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. Rumania hereby consents that any such dispute shall, if the other party thereto demands, be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice. The decision of the permanent court shall be final and shall have the same force and effect as an award under article 13 of the covenant."

This article would seem to indicate that the Jews of Rumania have been provided with a forum before which any infractions of the treaty can be brought. So far as the department is aware, no appeal has been made in behalf of the Jews of Rumania under this article of the treaty. The treaty, although signed by the American representatives at the Paris conference, was never ratified by the United States.

A copy of your letter is being forwarded to the American minister at Bucharest. I shall be happy to communicate with you again in case the department receives any information on the matters dealt with in your letter.

I am, my dear Mr. CELLER,

Sincerely yours,

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

(Inclosures: Copies of instructions dated July 17 and August 11, 1902.)

JANUARY 12, 1927.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,

Secretary State Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I acknowledge receipt of your letter dated January 11, in reply to mine dated December 31, 1926, concerning alleged mistreatment of the Jews in the cities of Kishineff, Kalrash, Jassy, and Bucharest.

While I differ with you in the position which you have taken, I do, indeed, respect your attitude and the policy of the Department of State which probably prompted it. You point out that a proper form has been provided in the treaty between the principal allied and associated powers and Rumania, signed at Paris on December 9, 1919, to which the Jews, as a minority population, can present their grievances. That form is the Council of the League of Nations, and in the event of an interpretation of the guaranties affecting racial, religious, or linguistic minorities, the matter shall be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

In my humble opinion, the treaty of Paris, signed December 9, 1919, would not create an exclusive remedy or set up an exclusive tribunal to which these grievances might be referred. I still think, on grounds of lofty humanity, our Government would have the moral right to protest along the lines suggested in my previous communication.

However, I am very grateful for your having given the deep consideration to this matter which your reply indicates.

Yours very respectfully,

E. CELLER.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1928.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,

Secretary State Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It is bruited about Wall Street that the Government of Rumania is negotiating the floating of an international loan of $60,000,000, a major portion of which is to be offered to the American public. It apparently is to stabilize the finances of Rumania. It is rumored that the Federal reserve bank at New York will be expected to join other financial institutions here and abroad in extending credit to this most bureaucratic and most medieval government in Europe.

Rumania, running true to its history, has made of itself during the last few years, as a result of pogroms and massacres of minority populations, a pariah among nations.

We, in America, stood aghast at the recent atrocities at Kishineff—outrages which we thought the post-war treaties had ended forever.

Rumania was bitterly condemned in the court of world opinion.

It was not the first time this benighted country stood condemned before the world. It has repeatedly violated the pledges given in the treaty of Berlin in 1878, wherein Disraeli demanded that it give assurance that it would treat its minority populations equitably, as a price for its becoming an independent nation. Rumania has never kept a promise or a treaty. It never will.

It renewed its pledges at Versailles in 1919 only to break them at Oradeamare this past year.

Now, its minister, Mr. George Cretziano, pledges his country to an honorable course for the future. But, however estimable Mr. Cretziano may be and however sincere personally, he can not bind the Bratiano dynasty and the Rumanian bureaucracy. He is a shadow. They the substance. Disapproval, no matter how harsh, criticism, no matter how bitter, have never made so much as a dent in the ironclad intolerance of this nation. Only the mailed fists or acts of other nations that threaten her security or self-interest have ever brought Rumania to terms. Secretary of State Hay, in 1902, forced her hand when he negotiated with the Government of Rumania for a convention of naturalization. He called attention to the treaty of Berlin, which prescribed:

"In Rumania, that difference of religious creeds and confessions shall not be alleged against any person as a ground for exclusion or incapacity in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil and political rights, admission to public employments, functions, and honors, or the exercise of the various professions and industries in any locality whatsoever."

He furthermore emphasized the fact that—

"with the lapse of time, these prescriptions have been rendered nugatory in great part, as regards the native Jews, by the legislation and municipal regulations of Rumania."

And that—

"by the cumulative effect of successive restrictions, the Jews of Rumania have become reduced to a state of wretched misery."

He indicated that the United States—

"can not be a tacit party to such an international wrong. It is constrained to protest against the treatment to which the Jews of Rumania are subjected, not alone because it has unimpeachable ground to remonstrate against the resultant injury itself but in the name of humanity."

It is needless to state that Rumania came to terms under the threats hurled at her by Secretary of State Hay.

Under date of December 31, 1926, I called your attention to the mistreatment of Jews in the cities of Kishineff, Kalrash, Jassy, and Bucharest. I then suggested that what was said by Secretary Hay in 1902 might readily be said by you in 1926. You replied, under date of January 11, 1927, that the status of minorities had undergone considerable change since 1902 and that the rights of minorities in Rumania had been fixed by the treaty signed at Paris in 1919, and that any grievance suffered by minority populations might be redressed in the Council of the League of Nations. You therefore held that the League of Nations was the proper forum before which any infractions of the treaty might be brought. But since the said treaty was not ratified by the United States, we could not intervene.

Under date of January 12, 1927, I responded and stated that in my humble opinion the Paris treaty of 1919 did not create an exclusive remedy or set up an exclusive tribunal to which the recent excesses in Rumania might be referred. I felt that on grounds of lofty humanity our Government had the moral right to protest.

Now, this same Government, guilty of those excesses, is knocking at our doors and seeks financial assistance.

I respectfully petition that you in your great office as Secretary of State disapprove of any loan to Rumania.

Even at this very writing we are informed that anti-Semitic atrocities again threaten Rumanian Jews, and that the imminence of such atrocities was the gist of an alarming interpolation introduced into the Rumanian House of Parliament on March 16 by one of its deputies.

While overtures made by the Rumanian minister to this country that he would endeavor to persuade his Government to renew its pledges of protection to minorities are most praiseworthy, and while his efforts should meet with encouragement, nevertheless Rumania should be forced to purge herself of her wrongs. She must be made to realize that she can expect no financial favors from us. That shall be her punishment.

Nearly three years ago the State Department closed American money markets to France, Italy, and Belgium until those countries agreed to settlement of their war-time debts to us. The ban has since been lifted as against Italy and Belgium, but the ban remains against France, although the State Department has agreed to the flotation of a French refunding loan, which would simply be a matter of refinancing at a lower interest rate.

If you placed embargoes against countries that failed to settle their debts with us, how much weightier is the reason for the similar ban against a country like Rumania, which has so sinned against morality and decency.

If you had no jurisdiction to protest in December, 1926, surely you have jurisdiction now to show Rumania in a most effective manner how she has offended.

I am informed that the Chase National Bank was urged not to finance a loan to Soviet Russia because of our proscription against its form of government and the actions of its officials in their attempt to subvert our Government.

Since March, 1922, virtually all of the loans made abroad have been reviewed by the State Department, the bankers, at the suggestion of the department, having voluntarily submitted their proposals to the department in advance.

I offer no opinion as to the legality of the actions of the Department of State. I presume it is the right of the Executive, through his State Department, to direct the foreign relations of the Government.

I presume that no exception will be made and that Blair & Co., the New York bankers, who are handling the loan, and the Federal Reserve Bank at New York, through Governor Strong, will present to you, in the ordinary course, the application for the loan for your approval or rejection.

I presume the application is already upon your desk. Would not your consent to that loan be construed as an approval of the acts of the government applying? You have assumed to censor the governments by disapproving loans to them because of their actions.

You stated that the policy of the State Department in this regard was as follows:

"It has objected to loans to countries which had not settled their debts to the United States, as it believed that it was not in the public interest to continue to make such loans, and it has objected to certain loans for armament and the monopolization of products consumed in the United States."

I, therefore, petition that you interdict any loan to Rumania by disapproving in the general public interest and upon grounds of high morality any application presented to you for that purpose.

Very truly yours,

E. CELLER.

FROM CONGRESSMAN EMANUEL CELLER

MARCH 26, 1928.

JOHN SULLIVAN, Esq.,
President New York State Federation of Labor,
Bible House, New York City.

MY DEAR PRESIDENT: I wish to congratulate you and the New York State Federation of Labor upon your foresight in conducting a discussion Sunday at the Washington Irving High School, in New York, on the subject of using reserve capital in public works at home, rather than in foreign loans, to the end that in some measure relief may be had from unemployment.

Under date of March 22, 1928, I addressed a communication to Mr. Kellogg, Secretary of State, asking that he proscribe against a loan of $60,000,000 to Rumania, which is about to be financed by American bankers together with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

Nearly three years ago the State Department closed American money markets to France, Italy, and Belgium until those countries agreed to settle their war-time debts to us. The ban has since been lifted as against Italy and Belgium, but still continues as against France. The Chase National Bank was likewise urged not to finance a loan to Soviet Russia, because of our proscription against its former government.

The Department of State has indirectly acted in the rôle of censor for the actions of governments. It has interdicted loans where foreign governments were to use same for armament, for the building up of monopolies of raw materials imported by us, and where the war debts of those countries had not been paid to us.

Although the action of the State Department is of doubtful legality, nevertheless, precedents have been established. For that reason I asked the Secretary of State to disapprove of the application of bankers that they be permitted to loan $60,000,000 to Rumania. That country has been guilty of extreme excesses and atrocities against its minority populations. Its Government has refrained from protecting said populations against pogroms and massacres. It stands condemned in the world of public opinion. It should not, therefore, receive financial aid from us.

Furthermore, there is an additional reason for our refusing aid. You and the friends of labor discussed that proposition at your recent meeting. Those funds might well be used for such public improvements as hydro-electric developments in the various States, for better housing, for roads, and for bridges, to the end that those now idle might be employed.

May I therefore ask the New York State Federation of Labor to join with me in protesting against any loans to Rumania.

Yours very truly,

E. CELLER.

THE NEW YORK STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
New York, N. Y., March 29, 1928.

Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: This is to acknowledge receipt of yours of March 26 regarding the contemplated loan of $60,000,000 to Rumania, which is about to be financed by the American bankers together with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

Personally, I agree with your views in this matter. It is a very true statement that the funds might well be used for public improvements at home, in order to give work to the unemployed. From what facts I have been able to gather from people who are in a position to know, the unemployment situation in this country was never worse than what it is at the present moment.

You realize that I can not speak for the New York State Federation of Labor relative to the proposed loan, because the subject matter was never brought before them. However, should it be necessary for a meeting of our council in the very near future, I shall be very glad indeed to bring the matter before them, and recommend the indorsement of your action on this proposition.

Again, let me say that I am in hearty accord with your stand in this matter.

Yours very truly,

JOHN SULLIVAN, President.

TO CONSCRIPT ALL MATERIAL RESOURCES IN FUTURE WARS

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] for 30 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that I have only a limited amount of time I must refuse to yield for questions until I have finished the argument I desire to make.

Mr. Speaker, 11 years ago a very few of you who are to-day Members of the House of Representatives and on the floor of this House to-day, sat in this same Chamber with me when the United States declared that a state of war existed between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany.

The leaders of this body during those strenuous days have, almost without exception not only left this Chamber but are no longer numbered among the living. Those of you who are living and present to-day who remember that historic occasion will recall that at the time it was said we were entering the conflict to make the world safe for democracy; to lift from the shoulders of our citizens the burden of future war preparation; to make certain the perpetuity of our Government and to end all future wars.

What we did or did not accomplish by our votes on that occasion is known only to Divine Providence.

Separated by a decade from the idealism, the propaganda, and the convictions that sent us into the greatest conflict of history entirely unprepared for the battles in which we engaged, we can be certain to-day that the world is no safer for democracy, the burden of preparation for defense no lighter, the perpetuity of our Government no more certain, and the danger of future wars no less because of the action of Congress on April 6, 1917.

We are certain that, because of the action of Congress on that day more than 50,000 fine, upstanding young American citizens were killed in battle, 300,000 of them wounded or otherwise disabled in line of duty, $25,000,000,000 expended in the conflict, and our annual expense for the care of the disabled from that war will for many years continue to exceed $500,000,000 annually.

There are 30,000 graves in France containing all that remains of our young friends of 11 years ago.

Some of us will never be able to forget them.

One of the great tragedies of this and every other war in which this country has engaged is the fact that war burdens are not equitably distributed, and in the world conflict, as in every other war, everything has been taken from one individual, even his life, while another has been legally permitted to enjoy all of life's luxuries and to become immensely wealthy. Most of the great fortunes in the United States to-day are founded upon war activities or Government contracts in time of war.

A few of you here now will recall that day in May, 1917, when we enacted the conscription law, the statute that forced the registration of more than 24,000,000 men and mobilized an Army of 2,800,000 soldiers, a million of them within the space of 90 days. Believing that universal conscription offered the only equitable plan for the formation of an Army, I voted for that statute, and have not lived to regret that fact. Never, Mr. Speaker, can I forget the debate on that occasion, when that great American citizen, Champ Clark, who, in my opinion, would have been a great President of the United States had he been selected for that office, and who formerly occupied with credit to his country and himself the chair which you now hold, took the floor to express his honest convictions. I remember that debate, as I can not help remember that it was my great privilege to travel eastward with one of the first overseas regiments selected under the law.

Many in that regiment crossed the ocean; many less returned. To-day we know the defects of that statute in that it provided only for the conscription of men and provided neither against profiteering nor the creation in war time of immense fortunes—fortunes accumulated through the needs and necessities of the citizens of the country. We did not recognize the fact that in time of war we should all serve equally and place the burden equally upon all the people; that capital and industry must serve as well as men. Generations past should have taught this lesson to the United States, because in every one of our wars there has been the same conscienceless profiteering.

During the Revolutionary War Gen. George Washington wrote:

> It gives me very sincere pleasure to find that there is likely to be a coalition of the Whigs in your State (a few only excepted) and that the assembly of it are so well disposed to second your endeavors in bringing those murderers of our cause—the monopolizers, forestallers, and engrossers—to condign punishment. It is much to be lamented that each State, long ere this, has not hunted them down as the pests of society and the greatest enemies we have to the happiness of America. I would to God that one of the most atrocious in each State was hung in gibbets upon a gallows five times as high as the one prepared by Haman. No punishment, in my opinion, is too great for the man who can "build his greatness upon his country's ruin."

During the Civil War a committee of this House, appointed to investigate war contracts, reported:

> The system of public plunder which pervaded * * * was inaugurated at the very beginning and followed up with untiring zeal; the public welfare was entirely overlooked and as effectually ignored as if the war was gotten up to enable a mammoth scheme of peculation at the expense of the people to be carried out.

And a member of the congressional committee stated:

> Such robbery, fraud, extravagance, peculation as have been developed * * * can hardly be conceived of. There has been an organized system of pillage. * * * I fear things have run on so far there is no remedy. * * * The credit of the Government is ruined. * * * Everybody knows there has been such an extent of swindling that payment ought not to be made. * * * I am utterly discouraged and disheartened.

After the Spanish-American War we remember the investigation of war contracts and the discussion concerning "embalmed beef."

In 1919 this House of Representatives appointed the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and the Speaker of this body appointed me a member of that committee. Hearings and reports of that committee comprise 19 volumes and, as that data is available, I shall not here attempt to discuss it. It should be said, however, that the committee was handicapped in every possible manner. If it appeared that the committee fixed any responsibility upon any individual for wrong-doing, a bipartisan combination was immediately created to protect such individual. Through the efforts of Representative ROY WOODRUFF, of Michigan, now a Member of this House, and myself an appropriation of $500,000 per year was given to the Department of Justice to attempt to recover on fraudulent war contracts. On April 11, 1922, Mr. WOODRUFF and myself introduced House Resolutions 323 and 324, requesting an investigation and action on these fraudulent contracts while there was yet time to recover the money. On April 11, 1922, as shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 5288 and adjoining pages of volume 62, part 5, of the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, we attempted to secure an investigation of the Department of Justice and other departments and men responsible for governmental frauds. Representative WOODRUFF at that time said:

> In the auditing of these war contracts it was disclosed that in almost every instance overpayments running into the millions of dollars in individual cases had been made by the Government. In addition to the overpayments it was found in nearly every instance that the contractors had been guilty of acts which clearly called for action by the Department of Justice. Notwithstanding the fact that much of this information has been in the hands of the Department of Justice for months, no determined action looking either to the recovery of the money due the Government or to the criminal prosecution of the offenders has been taken.

Our resolutions were sent to the Committee on Rules and rejected. In spite of that fact, because of the agitation and the debates on the floor of this House, which many of you remember, the department was forced to take action that actually recovered for the Government more than $20,000,000 in cash and millions of dollars in supplies that were returned to the Government. Twenty million dollars would pay the salary of a Member of Congress for 2,000 years. All this occurred in April and May, 1922, prior to the Teapot Dome affair, and prior to many other governmental frauds. It occurred at a time when it was extremely unpopular to attack the head of the Department of Justice with his Bureau of Investigation and Secret Service. The men in charge of these departments were then living—living in this city of Washington and in charge of the Government and all of its departments. They were in control of every avenue of publicity and possessed all the powers of Government.

It is the irony of fate that some of the very men who to-day in legislative bodies speak most grandiosely and extravagantly of the corruption of 1921 and 1922 were so strangely silent when their voices would have been of value and when the Government's property was being stolen. It is much safer to attack dead men without power than living men with power. We wished to lock the door before the horse was stolen, to investigate and act while illegal transactions were being conducted. Had this Congress of the United States cooperated with Mr. WOODRUFF and myself in 1922 a national scandal would have been averted.

It is entirely possible that there are some of you here to-day that now wish that you had then rendered assistance. I rejoice to be able to say that there are still men in both the House and the Senate that were of assistance and were willing to fight when the fighting was good.

Although at that time the House of Representatives refused to take action, there were men throughout the country, many of them service men, who knew the facts and were unafraid. The American Legion had been formed, and in 1921–22 it had a fighting commander, Hanford (Jack) MacNider. The Legion knew and he knew that wars were not ended, although the United States and its people desired participation in no further conflicts; that this country desires nothing but peace and covets neither the lands nor prosperity of any other nation. The Legion knew and he knew that we wish no part in the disputes or quarrels of other countries and desire each nation to work out its salvation in its own way, under its own laws, through its own citizens, and that we ask only that our citizens be treated according to the well-defined rules of international law. Although governmental action could not be secured, the Legion knew of the profiteering and frauds and determined that if another war was forced upon us its burdens should be equitably distributed. It determined that no new war fortunes should be created and that in war each individual should serve. With that ideal in mind, in September, 1922, Marquis James, a very distinguished newspaperman, and myself prepared the first universal conscription act ever introduced in the American Congress since the World War. On September 21, 1922, I introduced that resolution as House Joint Resolution 384. It read as follows:

That in the event of a declaration of war by the United States of America against any foreign government or other common enemy Congress shall provide for the conscription of every citizen and of all money, industries, and property of whatsoever nature necessary to the prosecution thereof, and shall limit the profits for the use of such moneys, industries, and property.

Mr. James and myself carried this resolution to the annual convention of the American Legion held in New Orleans, October 16–20, 1922, and the plan of universal conscription carried in that proposed resolution was adopted by that convention. In every succeeding Congress I have reintroduced it, changing the phraseology as we learned more of the practical operation of the law. A very distinguished committee of the American Legion appointed by Colonel MacNider labored strenuously in the development of the measure and has assisted in every way in carrying it to final passage. On January 4, 1928, in this Congress as H. R. 8313, I introduced the perfected bill which we propose to enact, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives. It reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the event of a declaration of war by Congress which in the judgment of the President demands the immediate increase of the Military Establishment, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to draft into the service of the United States such members of the unorganized militia as he may deem necessary: Provided, That all persons drafted into service between the ages of 21 and 30, or such other limits as the President may fix, shall be drafted without exemption on account of industrial occupation.

SEC. 2. That in case of war, or when the President shall judge the same to be imminent, he is authorized and it shall be his duty when, in his opinion, such emergency requires it—

(a) To determine and proclaim the material resources, industrial organizations, and services over which Government control is necessary to the successful termination of such emergency, and such control shall be exercised by him through agencies then existing or which he may create for such purposes;

(b) To take such steps as may be necessary to stabilize prices of services and of all commodities declared to be essential, whether such services and commodities are required by the Government or by the civilian population.

Hearings on the measure were held by the House Committee on Military Affairs from March 11 to March 20, 1924, but no hearings have been granted by that committee on the bill I am now presenting to the House.

No hearings, in my opinion, will be granted by that committee, and the proposed law will again quietly and peacefully die unless by action of this House the committee is instructed under clause 4 of rule 27, which I shall to-day invoke, to report the bill. It would thereupon automatically, under the rules of the House, be brought before us for a vote. If this measure becomes the law of the land it will make future wars the business of every citizen and exorbitant monetary profits will accrue to no individual. Its effects could never be better expressed than in the statement of Hanford MacNider when he said:

The greatest peace measure of the men who fought the last war still lies before the Congress unpassed—waiting for the men who understand what it is all about. It goes by various names and, perhaps, its present form will be changed before it is written upon the statute books of the Nation. Its principle, however, is right and its basis is sound. It whips in advance the men who would start an unjust or unjustified conflagration. It makes war so inclusive that no jingo would ever be able to make it popular. In short, it directs that hereafter all the Nation's resources—capital, power, transportation, labor—will all go to war on the same basis with men's lives. When there is written into the law that no price nor service in America shall rise because of national emergency, that no man shall evade his duty, that no resource of the Nation, nor any individual within it shall remain aloof or in favored position, that all America will go forth as one man to the Nation's defense, then and then only will our mandate be on its way toward fulfillment. Then we shall be able to say authoritatively what now we can only say in speeches on days like this, "America not only wants peace but America intends to have it."

As was so well stated to me recently by Edward McE. Lewis, of the Legion:

This statute will do more to end war than all other legislation, for it will make men think before they act.

The present commander of the American Legion, Commander Edward E. Spafford, who has had much war experience and is a student of war legislation, has expressed the belief that in its ultimate consequences this is the most important preparedness measure pending before Congress.

Both the Republican and Democratic Parties in their platforms have promised that this measure will become the law of the land. You—and each of you who are present to-day were elected on those platforms—are pledged thereby to its support. You Republicans in your platform of 1924 said:

We believe that in time of war the Nation should draft for its defense not only its citizens, but also every resource which may contribute to success. The country demands that should the United States ever again be called upon to defend itself by arms, the President be empowered to draft such material resources and such services as may be required and to stabilize the prices of services and essential commodities, whether utilized in actual warfare or private activity.

You Democrats in your platform of 1924 said:

War is a relic of barbarism, and it is justifiable only as a measure of defense.

In the event of war, in which the man power of the Nation is drafted, all other resources should likewise be drafted. This will tend to discourage war by depriving it of its profits.

You of the Democratic Party who were elected by the suffrage of the people because you told them you would give them this law are going to have a chance to-day to say whether you desire to sign up and secure its passage.

The measure has been indorsed by Presidents Harding and Coolidge.

In his inaugural address of March 4, 1921, President Harding stated:

If war is again forced upon us, I earnestly hope a way may be found which will unify our individual and collective strength and consecrate all America, materially and spiritually, body and soul, to national defense. I can vision the ideal republic, where every man and woman is called under the flag for assignment to duty for whatever service, military or civic, the individual is best fitted; where we may call to universal service every plant, agency, or facility, all in the sublime sacrifice for country, and not one penny of war profit shall inure to the benefit of private individual, corporation, or combination, but all above the normal shall flow into the defense chest of the Nation. There is something inherently wrong, something out of accord with the ideals of representative democracy, when one portion of our citizenship turns its activities to private gain amid defensive war while another is fighting, sacrificing, or dying for national preservation.

Out of such universal service will come a new unity of spirit and purpose, a new confidence and consecration, which would make our defense impregnable, our triumph assured. Then we should have little or no disorganization of our economic, industrial, and commercial systems at home, no staggering war debts, no swollen fortunes to flout the sacrifices of our soldiers, no excuse for sedition, no pitiable slackerism, no outrage of treason.

Then again, at Helena, Mont., on June 29, 1923, President Harding advocated the universal draft in the following remarkable language:

I have said before, and I choose to repeat it very deliberately now, that if war must come again—God grant that it shall not—then we must draft all of the Nation in carrying on. It is not enough to draft the young manhood. It is not enough to accept the voluntary service of both women and men whose patriotic devotion impels their enlistment. It will be righteous and just, it will be more effective in war and marked by less regret in the aftermath, if we draft all of capital, all of industry, all of agriculture, all of commerce, all of talent and capacity and energy of every description, to make the supreme and united and unselfish fight for the national triumph. When we do that there will be less of war. When we do that the contest will be aglow with unsullied patriotism, untouched by profiteering in any service. * * *

If we are committed to universal service—that is, the universal commitment of every American resource and activity—without compensation except the consciousness of service and the exaltations in victory, we will be slower to make war and more swift in bringing it to a triumphant close. Let us never again make draft on our manhood without as exacting a draft on all we possess in the making of the industrial, financial, commercial, and spiritual life of the Republic.

On October 4, 1925, in the American Legion convention at Omaha, Nebr., President Coolidge indorsed the measure when he said:

Undoubtedly one of the most important provisions in the preparation for national defense is a proper and sound selective service act.

Such a law ought to give authority for a very broad mobilization of all the resources of the country, both persons and materials. I can see some difficulties in the application of the principle, for it is the payment of a higher price that stimulates an increased production, but whenever it can be done without economic dislocation such limits ought to be established in time of war as would prevent, so far as possible, all kinds of profiteering. There is little defense which can be made of a system which puts some men in the ranks on very small pay and leaves others undisturbed to reap very large profits. Even the income tax, which recaptured for the benefit of the National Treasury alone about 75 per cent of such profits, while local governments took part of the remainder, is not a complete answer. The laying of taxes is, of course, in itself a conscription of whatever is necessary of the wealth of the country for national defense, but taxation does not meet the full requirements of the situation. In the advent of war, power should be lodged somewhere for the stabilization of prices as far as that might be possible in justice to the country and its defenders.

Mr. Speaker, as this proposed statute has been promised by the two great political parties that control the Government of the United States, as it has been indorsed by the greatest citizens of this country, as it has been indorsed by the American Legion and other organizations, whose members actually fought the World War; as it has been pledged by an overwhelming majority of the membership of this House, as it is advocated by the patriotic, intelligent citizenship of this country and because it is everlastingly right, just, and equitable, I now invoke the most drastic rule of this body, clause 4 of rule 27, to force its consideration and file with the Clerk of the House a motion to instruct the Committee on Military Affairs of this body to report H. R. 8313.

If 218 of the nearly 300 Members of this body pledged to the support of this bill will sign this motion we will get action. The motion is now upon the Clerk's desk for signature and can be signed from this moment. Personally, I believe that when a majority of the Members of this body sign this motion the fight is won without invoking the legislative machinery provided under the rule, because I firmly believe the Speaker of this House is always responsive to its real wishes and will at the proper time recognize me to suspend the rules and pass the bill. Whatever he may do, the bill will become a law before the close of the session. The motion which I have filed is as follows:

(Seventieth Congress. No. 2)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 3, 1928.

Motion to instruct a committee from the consideration of a bill

To the CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

Pursuant to clause 4 of Rule XXVII (see rule on last page), I, ROYAL C. JOHNSON, move to instruct the Committee on Military Affairs to report the bill H. R. 8313, entitled "A bill to provide further for the national security and defense," which was referred to said committee January 4, 1928, in support of which motion the undersigned Members of the House of Representatives affix their signatures, to wit:

3.
4. (Space for signatures of Members—218 required)
5.

This, Mr. Speaker, will, 11 years from the time we declared war on the Imperial German Government, establish the rule that, in event of another war, our country, its industries and its men will render equal service and, Members of the House, I hope that now those of you who believe in this measure will sign this motion that will enact the law. [Applause.]

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. MCSWAIN, of South Carolina, be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes on this subject.

The SPEAKER. At this point?

Mr. MORIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN] may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina has yielded one minute to me before he begins his remarks.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Can that be done under the special permission granted?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he may now address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this morning my attention was called to the fact that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] was going to address the House on this subject. I had an examination made of the jacket containing the bills referred to that were introduced in the House; I have had the files of my office searched and I have failed to find a formal request made by either Mr. JOHNSON or any other Member of the House for a hearing on this bill.

This is a very important measure, in which the members of the committee are interested, and I will submit to the Members of this House the fact that it is one upon which there should be very exhaustive hearings before it is reported to this House. There are 11 ex-service men on that committee, all interested in this legislation. I have canvassed the committee and I have failed to find one member of the committee who says that he has ever been approached on this subject or requested to have a hearing. Now, having submitted that information to the House, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, I am immensely surprised that the distinguished gentleman and gallant former soldier from South Dakota should proceed in this manner to bring to the attention of this House the bills that he now has pending before this committee. You have just been assured by the chairman of this committee that the gentleman from South Dakota has never asked for a hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs. The gentleman from South Dakota has not only one bill before that committee but he has three bills. On the 5th of December, 1927, the gentleman introduced House bill 455; on the 4th day of January, 1928, he introduced House bill 8313; and evidently within about 30 minutes thereafter, and forgetting that he had already introduced two bills on the same subject, January 4, 1928, he introduced House bill 8329, so that he has introduced three bills—every one identical, line for line and comma for comma, on the same subject. Yet he has never set his foot in the committee room nor spoken to a member of the committee that I know about asking for a hearing. [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. And that not only applies to this session but applies to the last session?

Mr. MCSWAIN. Yes.

The gentleman's position and his procedure here shall not alienate me from my loyalty and my devotion to the general principle that he invoked. It is a difference between the gentleman and me as to the method by which we will proceed to accomplish that which in the hearts of all just men ought some time to be accomplished. [Applause.] Very soon after the gentleman introduced his first bill in 1922 I introduced a joint resolution in the Sixty-seventh Congress, in December, 1922, asking for the creation of a commission composed of Members of both the House and the Senate and of civilians, and I reintroduced the same resolution in the Sixty-eighth Congress. Upon this resolution, along with a bill that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] was the author of, and along with a bill that the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] and some others had introduced to the same effect, hearings were held upon all the bills collectively, and here are the hearings, consisting of 250 pages, and the quotations that the gentleman reads as to the opinion of George Washington about profiteers, and as to the profiteering during the Civil War and during the Spanish-American War, were all culled out of these hearings that were compiled by me in the Committee on Military Affairs at that time.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. And did not the gentleman who is speaking also introduce a resolution which was referred to the Rules Committee, and did not the gentleman ask for a hearing and receive one from that committee?

Mr. MCSWAIN. I did; yes. That resolution was introduced by me in the Sixty-eighth Congress, was reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs, and, pressing the matter, I appeared before the Rules Committee and the Rules Committee gave us a rule, but they did not give it until the very last day of the session, and when the gentleman from New York, who was then chairman of the Rules Committee, brought the matter up, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] interposed very earnest and vigorous objection, and the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Rules Committee, withdrew the resolution from consideration by the House at that time in view of the fact that the time of the House was very limited before its adjournment on that very day, having been assured, as he said, that there would be no controversy about it.

Now, gentlemen, by what devious route does the gentleman from South Dakota propose to bring this matter before the House? There was an adequate and efficient discharge rule that was on the books of this House in the Sixty-eighth Congress, and the gentleman from South Dakota voted to repeal that rule, in effect, by voting for the present rule. He voted to establish here a rule of this body by which if 218 Members signed a petition, and then if you have tellers on two separate days, the matter then comes up for consideration in the committee, and then if the committee holds it for 15 days and does not report, it is put on the calendar for consideration. We will have adjourned before he could ever get his bill up in the House.

Gentlemen, this is too important a matter, is a matter involving too vital consequences to the life of the Nation to be passed upon in any half-considered way. There must be hearings and patient study and consideration.

It requires, I submit—and I have studied the matter with great care and patience and deliberation—the counsel and the advice of men of widest experience and deepest knowledge in order that we may not make some mistake of that which we propose to do in the interest of the national life.

I want to repeat, gentlemen, I have not only sought to show my faith by my works in the matter, but I have spoken in behalf of the general principle before the national convention of the women standing for adequate defense, including the Daughters of the American Revolution, and also advocated this principle before the Interparliamentary Union at Geneva, Switzerland, in the year 1924, and have repeatedly addressed the House and extended my remarks in the RECORD in advocacy of this general principle.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman think that his committee ought to consider this matter and bring it before the House rather than to have it brought before the House in any other way?

Mr. McSWAIN. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. In other words, should not the matter be brought before the House by the committee having jurisdiction to hear and consider it and not by a discharge rule?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; exactly.

Mr. REECE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. In one moment. I want to say to the distinguished majority leader, who is to-day 62 years old but is as vigorous as a youth of 50 [applause], that this committee has over 1,000 bills before it, and we have been busy not only during the day but part of the night working on them; and we have been too busy to take up bills of Members who have not asked for a hearing; but if the gentleman from South Dakota will come before the committee I will guarantee—and I have already the authority of the committee to say so—that he will have a hearing and all the hearings he wants. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. REECE. There has been no disposition on the part of the committee or any member of the committee to delay the consideration of this matter, has there?

Mr. McSWAIN. Absolutely none; and I will guarantee that the committee will sit up at night in order to give a hearing; and I am in favor of it, just like the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER.] The gentleman from Iowa and I have worked together and have deliberated about this matter for years. He knows my heart and I know his, and I know and he knows that this is a matter of the deepest importance and requires the most careful and painstaking consideration.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman know of a single Member of Congress who has a private bill or a public bill that has ever been denied a hearing by our committee?

Mr. McSWAIN. Absolutely none. If any Member of this House can say that he has ever appeared before the committee or before any member of the committee and asked for a hearing before a subcommittee or before the full committee on any subject and not received it with respect to any of the 1,000 bills before the committee, then I would like for him to rise now and let it be known, because I would like for the House to know that our committee is a working committee which works all day and sometimes late in the night.

I want to assure my distinguished friend from South Dakota that if he will come before the committee we will hear him on all three of his bills, and he would be only killing his own proposition to handle it in the way he now proposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I want to state to the gentleman the reason there happened to be more than one bill introduced was because when I was in the hospital and had not been sworn in the bill was sent over here, and therefore I had to reintroduce it, and without entering into any joint debate with the gentleman, I may say that I first introduced this bill in 1922, and the gentleman can talk about hearings all he wants to, but we do not get anywhere with hearings.

Mr. McSWAIN. Of course, the committee has had this matter before it since 1922. The committee held the hearings which I conducted, and the gentleman has never been before the committee asking for a hearing. If we have had time, the gentleman has had time. If we have had four years, he has had four years. Time for us is time for him.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for five minutes. I do not want to get into this controversy, but I do not want to let go unchallenged the statement of the gentleman from South Dakota in the beginning of his speech made a while ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, we want to get started with the rubber bill assigned for to-day. If I do not object at this time, I hope there will be no further request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I was one of the Members here 11 years ago, and I regret that I have to rise to note a protest against the inference which would be drawn if unchallenged by the statement of the gentleman from South Dakota that all we got out of the war was $25,000,000,000 expense, 50,000 men gone, and a great many fraudulent claims prosecuted against the Government, and so on.

It strikes me that the inference would be made that we fought for nothing. Now, I am going to read a very brief part of the message which called this Congress to action on that proposition:

> But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable. Because submarines are in effect outlaws when used as the German submarines have been used against merchant shipping, it is impossible to defend ships against their attack, as the law of nations has assumed that merchantmen would defend themselves against privateers or cruisers, visible craft giving chase upon the open sea. It is common prudence in such circumstances, grim necessity, indeed, to endeavor to destroy them before they have shown their own intention. They must be dealt with upon sight, if dealt with at all. The German Government denies the right of neutrals to use arms at all within the areas of the sea which it has proscribed, even in the defense of rights which no modern publicist has ever before questioned their right to defend. The intimation is conveyed that the armed guards which we have placed on our merchant ships will be treated as beyond the pale of law and subject to be dealt with as pirates would be. Armed neutrality is ineffectual at best; in such circumstances and in the face of such pretensions it is worse than ineffectual; it is likely only to produce what it was meant to prevent; it is practically certain to draw us into the war with neither the rights nor the effectiveness of belligerents. There is one choice we can not make, we are incapable of making; we will not choose the path of submission [applause] and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrong; they cut at the very roots of human life.

I am sure gentlemen will remember that when that came from the lips of the President, after enumerating many outrages on our rights that the audience led by the Chief Justice and members of the Supreme Court rose in a mass and the applause almost shook the House because they determined that submission was something incompatible with the history and traditions of the American people, and that they would not stop at any expenditure of men or money to maintain the rights that have been established more than 140 years before, which to-day we are ready to maintain, and we do not propose to apologize for having gone into the war regardless of anything said by the gentleman from South Dakota. [Applause.]

LETTER OF RESIGNATION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I regret that I can not attend the unveiling exercises of the statue of Gen. Robert E. Lee on Stone Mountain April 9, and respectfully request that some other Member of Congress be appointed in my place to attend these exercises.

Respectfully yours,

L. J. STEELE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP, in place of Mr. STEELE.

Under the special order the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUDSON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I object for the present. I think it is a wrong principle to get leave to extend remarks before the remarks are made and before we know what the speech is about. I object for the present.

POISON IN DENATURED ALCOHOL

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH], on Friday, March 2, 1928, seems to call for certain corrections, that the facts concerning the use of denaturants by the Government and their effect may be set forth. In making this address to-day I have asked the assistance of Dr. Harrison E. Howe, editor in chief of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry, published by the American Chemical Society at Washington, D. C. Doctor Howe is recognized throughout the world as one of our foremost chemist scholars, and I have taken the liberty to quote him in my address this morning in several instances.

The gentleman from New York said his object was the discussion of poison alcohol, and stated that the dictates of humanity demanded that our Government cease at once the putting of poison into denatured alcohol, which he stated was destroying the lives of thousands of our human beings.

There should be no difference of opinion concerning the fundamental principles enunciated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH], namely, that a beverage should not be deliberately poisoned. However, he loses sight of the fact that denatured alcohol without criminal manipulation is not potable; that we do not poison but effectively denature alcohol for industrial uses; and that while there is continued serious effort to find a satisfactory denaturant, nontoxic in character, after all what is most needed is more effective policing to the end that those who endeavor to remove all warning signs from denatured alcohol may be apprehended and their criminal practices stopped.

In discussing this subject the gentleman from New York fell into a number of errors, indicating that while he may be entirely competent as a physician he has not been careful to inform himself fully with respect to the chemistry involved, nor even the history on the subject of denaturants and of industrial alcohol.

A denaturant to be acceptable must give a warning by taste or odor of its presence, must be extremely difficult if not impossible to separate from the alcohol, and must be of such a nature that it will not interfere with the industrial processes where alcohol is essential as a raw material. Industrial alcohol was legalized long before the eighteenth amendment was passed, and is used to-day in great quantities in several foreign countries where prohibition is not an issue. As the gentleman from New York points out, industrial alcohol was legalized to enable the use of this important solvent and chemical raw material in great quantities without the payment of the excise tax. That condition still obtains in most foreign countries, and even there where potable liquors can be legally purchased, the temptation to consume the denatured alcohol, manipulated to render it potable, presents a problem closely akin to that which confronts the United States.

This problem of finding a nontoxic denaturant acceptable in all other respects has engaged the attention of some of the test chemists in France, Germany, Great Britain, and the United States for periods of from 20 to 50 years. A considerable list of materials which would cause the drinker to become deathly sick but suffer no permanent injury can be named, but the ease with which nearly all of them can be removed from denatured alcohol indicates their unsuitability as denaturants. The past few months have seen difficulties in the iodine market, because bootleggers have fastened upon the tincture of iodine as a material to be diverted. The tincture of iodine has been purchased in large quantities and the iodine precipitated out in the form of zinc iodide by chemical means. Legitimate industry has been embarrassed by the large quantity of this by-product, zinc iodide, that has been offered, and regulations have had to be perfected to protect this household germicide and disinfectant from the attacks of the bootlegging fraternity.

No one deliberately poisons alcohol. It is simply an unfortunate fact that those chemical compounds which meet the specifications for a satisfactory denaturant are toxic materials. Let us examine the facts with respect to those denaturants suggested by the gentleman from New York, remembering that the chemists employed by the bootleggers are not the half-baked variety which he describes, but in many cases men of real scientific attainments. In passing, it should also be noted that the gentleman from New York is in error when he describes 99 per cent alcohol, absolute alcohol, ethyl alcohol, and grain alcohol as being synonymous terms. Ethyl alcohol, as regularly produced from either molasses or corn—and by far the greatest amount is from molasses—is about 95 per cent, the remaining 5 per cent being largely water. This is known as grain alcohol or ethyl alcohol and does not become absolute ethyl alcohol until all the moisture has been removed. The percentage approaches very close to 100, and this product is known either as absolute ethyl alcohol or anhydrous ethyl alcohol. A few years ago this sold for $5 a gallon, tax free, to educational institutions, but new methods for removing materials other than ethyl alcohol have made it possible to produce it in larger quantities at very much lower prices. Quoting Doctor Howe, as to denaturants used by the Government:

Bichloride of mercury is mentioned in the address by Congressman SIROVICH. This has never been used as a denaturant for industrial alcohol. Prior to May, 1924, wholesale or retail druggists were permitted to medicate alcohol with bichloride of mercury, and it could then be purchased for sterilization purposes. Such medicated alcohol was sometimes used for rubbing purposes, but when regulations No. 60, now known as No. 2, were revised in May, 1924, this formula was eliminated because at times there had been serious irritation of the skin where such medicated alcohol had been used for rubbing. No reports of any deaths caused by drinking this alcohol have been made and it is now almost four years since bichloride of mercury could be used for medicated alcohol, not industrial alcohol, and it was only obtainable in a drug store.

Formaldehyde and carbolic acid or phenol, to use the chemical term, have been authorized as denaturants for a few specially denatured alcohol formulas which are used in manufacturing antiseptics and sterilizing solutions, mouth washes, dentifrices, embalming fluid, and lotions for external purposes. These two chemicals are authorized because they are found in the preparations enumerated above as part of the medicinal ingredients of the finished products. These chemicals were found in preparations made with nonbeverage tax-paid alcohol and were so used for their medicinal properties long before denatured alcohol or the eighteenth amendment became realities. It may be well to call attention to the fact that alcohol is an antidote for carbolic acid.

Very large quantities of benzene or benzol have been used for denaturing alcohol because the chemical industries requested it. Specially denatured alcohol No. 2-B containing one-half per cent of benzol has been used to dehydrate nitrocellulose and for the manufacture of ethyl acetate. Alcohol denatured with benzol has been used extensively in the imitation leather and lacquer industries, but specially denatured alcohol formulas containing benzol are gradually being withdrawn because benzol can be easily removed from the alcohol. A recent Treasury decision withdrew the benzol formulas from lacquers and another is now being prepared to withdraw the same formulas from the imitation leather industry solely because of the ease with which this denaturant can be removed. Specially denatured alcohol formulas containing benzol are now authorized only for the manufacture of ethyl acetate and other chemicals where it would be impractical to use alcohol denatured with any other substance. This is one of the cases where the fact that pure chemicals or drugs can not be made from alcohol unless the alcohol is denatured with some compound that will not take part in the chemical reactions involved, and thus become a part of the finished product, is a ruling factor.

Brucine sulphate is also indicated in Mr. SIROVICH'S speech. This is authorized in formula No. 40 for toilet preparations. The leading medical authorities now agree that brucine sulphate is practically nontoxic and its former reputation has been shown to be due to inefficient purification, sometimes leaving traces of strychnine in the preparation. The specifications for this denaturant now require that it be free of strychnine, and although it has been used as a denaturant for a number of years no reports are found showing that it has injured anyone.

Malachite green is suggested by the Congressman as a successful denaturant, but unfortunately it can not be accepted as such. Malachite green is a well-known dyestuff, but it is nonvolatile and would remain behind on the redistillation of the alcohol. Its removal is even more simple, inasmuch as absorptive carbon would be effective in eliminating it.

Now we come to pyridine and diethyl phthalate, which Mr. SIROVICH believes he has independently discovered for the benefit of the chemical industry. Pyridine was one of the first denaturants authorized after the act of June, 1906, and several million gallons have been used since that time. It is, then, not the new denaturant Mr. SIROVICH would have you believe but one of nearly 22 years' standing, and but lately dropped from the list of denaturants because it has been shown that it can be easily removed by ordinary distillation in the presence of an acid. It is therefore no longer authorized, except for specially denatured alcohol No. 6–B, used for the manufacture of chemicals. Many believe pyridine to be more toxic than any of the denaturants mentioned above, with the exception of bichloride of mercury and carbolic acid. While pyridine is still used in England and the British possessions, a substitute is desired, for there, too, they find that alcohol denatured with it is too easily diverted.

As for diethyl phthalate, its use was authorized several years ago, and alcohol denatured with it is being extensively used in the manufacture of toilet preparations. Unfortunately, this denaturant is also easily removed from alcohol by simple distillation, and it is believed that more alcohol has been diverted to beverage purposes from the legitimate industry when denatured with pyridine and diethyl phthalate than any other denatured alcohol formulas.

Attention should be called to the constructive efforts of the chemists of the Prohibition Unit and the cooperation which they obtain from their fellow chemists in industry in an effort to improve the denatured industrial alcohol situation. Reference is made to the use of aldehol, for example, this being a product of the oxidation of kerosene used in conjunction with methyl alcohol, and proving itself an efficient reagent in that it complicates decidedly the work of removing methanol or wood alcohol from the denatured material. Notwithstanding the extensive work in all countries on denaturants, methyl or wood alcohol continues to be one of the best, if not the most satisfactory, especially when used in a proportion of 10 per cent or more by volume. Larger percentages are used by other countries than by the United States, and with the increase in percentage it becomes necessary to employ more extensive and costly and complicated equipment and to operate it on a large scale if the bootlegger would clean it out of the finished article, if indeed this could be accomplished. Detection is, therefore, made easier and loss greater in case of confiscation, so that the bootlegging industry becomes far less attractive.

Furthermore, pure ethyl alcohol is not available on a tax-free basis for the arts and industries, and even if relieved of the tax would not be acceptable in lieu of denatured alcohol for two principal reasons. First, the regulations controlling the transportation, storage, and use of such alcohol would involve great burdens and extraordinary risks to the industry; and, secondly, in certain lines of trade such as the shellac varnishes, mixtures of ethyl and methyl alcohol constitute preferable solvents.

Now in discussing "violent poisons," which are said to be added to alcohol by the Government, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] takes no account of the toxicity of ethyl alcohol or grain alcohol, which is that member of the large family of alcohols which those who insist on liquors wish to drink. Our leading pharmacologists—Reid Hunt, A. S. Loevenhart, and others—are of the opinion that a single large dose of a mixture containing 4 parts of wood alcohol and 96 parts of grain alcohol would cause harm principally on account of the grain alcohol. Pure grain or ethyl alcohol alone is quite poisonous and death frequently results from an overdose, especially if the individual is drinking a preparation stronger than that to which he is accustomed. Wood alcohol is undoubtedly toxic, but a careful examination of the statements by such men as Hermann C. Lythgoe, director of the division of food and drugs, department of public health, Boston, and Louis I. Harris, commissioner of health in New York City, clearly indicates that in an overwhelming number of cases of death due to alcoholism the great majority are due to an overdose of just straight ethyl alcohol rather than the presence of any of the denaturants used in industrial alcohol. Thus, Commissioner Harris states that in addition to the 750 deaths reported as due to alcoholism, there were also reported during 1926, 7 deaths in which wood alcohol was specifically mentioned as the cause of death; also that an inquiry of the chief hospitals in the city of New York as to the number of clinical cases of alcoholism which they had had under their care in the period from December 24, 1926, to January 4, 1927, disclosed that there were 337 cases of alcoholism then under care with only one attributable to wood-alcohol poisoning. These reports could be extended and many statistics quoted, but they all bear out this same fact.

I wish at this time to call your attention to two extracts from the March 22, 1928, issue of the New England Journal of Medicine, the official organ of the Massachusetts Medical Society.

Dr. Reid Hunt, professor of pharmacology, Harvard Medical School, writing on the subject of "An examination of the toxicity of 100 samples of illicit liquor," said:

The only poisonous substance of significance found in these samples was ethyl alcohol and the toxicity of the various samples was closely parallel to the ethyl alcohol content. Although much has been said and written recently on the alleged great toxicity of much of the illicit liquor now being sold, I know of no analyses or experiments indicating the presence of substances distinctly more toxic than ethyl alcohol and present in sufficient amounts to have a distinct effect. * * * Deaths are, of course, constantly occurring from the consumption of illicit liquor but very rarely has any evidence been offered that they were not due entirely to the ethyl alcohol. A fact frequently overlooked is that a person deeply intoxicated is near death and that a dose of alcohol slightly greater than that necessary to cause profound intoxication is a fatal dose. This condition may be realized when a liquor of unusually high alcohol content is consumed in the same quantities as if it contained the more usual percentage of alcohol. Three instances apparently of this character have been brought to my attention; death was attributed to "poison whisky" but the "whisky" in question contained, in two cases, over 60 per cent of ethyl alcohol and in the third case 80 per cent of ethyl alcohol, and no other poison was found. * * * The problem seems to be still primarily a question of ethyl alcohol, rather than one of "good" or "bad" alcohol. In other words, it is not the so-called "bad bootleg liquor" but the reputed "good grain alcohol" which causes acute poisoning and death; this is the case with both the illicit and the "medicinal" whisky.

Dr. George H. Bigelow, commissioner of public health of Massachusetts, addressing himself to the question "Are 'alcohol deaths' due to alcohol?", had the following to say:

The results of chemical and pharmacological examination suggests that as far as Massachusetts is concerned such factors as wood alcohol, methanol, furfural, and other extraneous substances have been very much exaggerated, and what is killing people now who die of alcoholism is what killed them back in the days of the high alcoholic death rates of 1916 and 1917 and before, namely, ethyl alcohol, "grain" alcohol, or "good pure" alcohol. * * * Ethyl alcohol, then, is, has been, and always will be a poison which can not be tolerated by the body in excess, and in the vast majority of cases "alcohol deaths" in Massachusetts are apparently due to excessive use of "good pure alcohol."

Also a letter from Doctor Doran:

USE OF POISON IN DENATURED ALCOHOL

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF PROHIBITION,
Washington, March 3, 1928.

Hon. GRANT M. HUDSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In looking over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 2, particularly the remarks of Congressman SIROVICH with respect to the denaturing of alcohol, I would say that, while there is practically nothing new in his statement that was not fully covered in the last session of Congress and printed in Senate Document No. 195, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session, some emphasis was placed on the use of pyridine. We eliminated pyridine in November, 1926, to take final effect April 1, 1927, for the reason that it was being readily deodorized and to a large extent removed by the simple addition of sufficient sulphuric acid to neutralize the pyridine and subsequent distillation. It is one of the weakest denaturants heretofore employed on account of this comparative ease of removal by deodorization and partial removal by distillation. Pyridine is commercially made in Germany, but was heretofore sold to the United States through a London syndicate which absolutely controlled quantity and prices. So far as this bureau is concerned, we consider oil compounds more effective as denaturants and less easy to remove. They are not considered toxic.

Very sincerely yours,

J. M. DORAN,
Commissioner of Prohibition.

In his remarks, which are set forth on pages 3202 to 3207 of the RECORD of February 17, Representative CRAMTON quoted at some length from the address delivered at New Orleans before the Federal and State Law Enforcement League by Capt. James P. McGovern, general counsel of the Industrial Alcohol Manufacturers' Association and Washington attorney for the National Paint, Oil, & Varnish Association, from which the following paragraph is taken:

As a striking illustration of the difficulties under which reputable merchants are compelled to market their products under prohibition enforcement conditions let us take the case of the 40-year-old solidified fuel known as Sterno Canned Heat. We are all familiar with that commodity in its self-contained tins ready for burning in the home, camp, nursery, hospital, sick room, laboratory, and other places where an emergency fuel is required. It proved of inestimable value in the districts devastated by the Florida hurricane, your own Mississippi flood, and other disasters where an emergency fuel was sorely needed. It is manufactured under a formula approved pursuant to the provisions of the Volstead Act, calling for five parts of wood alcohol and a percentage of pyridine, kerosene, and solidifying chemicals which make the finished commodity—in the opinion of Commissioner Doran the most unfit substance for beverage purposes that could possibly be conceived; and yet we find intelligent people demanding that the sale of such an essential article of everyday life be stopped or subjected to prohibitive conditions because there are degenerates who unlawfully manipulate the product and extract therefrom a liquid which they take into their stomachs, with what results only hospital and morgue records can tell! Isn't that actually glorifying degeneracy, and does not the whole situation merely call for better enforcement of the adequate United States laws on the subject, which provide severe punishment for any person who sells or uses alcoholic preparations for illegal purposes? Surely law-abiding business men are entitled to your sympathetic support, instead of being harassed on all sides in their lawful pursuits.

On March 28 Commissioner Doran received an inquiry from Mr. Chalmers Potter, of Messrs. Green, Green & Potter, Jackson, Miss., as to the denaturants used in the manufacture of Sterno Canned Heat, and whether the Federal laws were adequate to punish any person who unlawfully extracted a liquid from the product and diverted it to beverage purposes. The commissioner sent to him, under date of the 29th ultimo, the following telegram:

[Treasury Department telegram]

CHALMERS POTTER, OF GREEN, GREEN & POTTER,
Merchants Bank Building, Jackson, Miss.:

Replying yours 28th, Sterno Canned Heat is a solidified fuel manufactured pursuant to formula approved and permit issued under provisions of national prohibition act. Revised formula voluntarily perfected by company recently and approved by this omice shows that it contains 5 per cent of denaturing grade wood alcohol and other ingredients including pyridine and kerosene with nitrocellulose as the solidifying substance. Any liquid which might be unlawfully obtained therefrom would still contain such wood alcohol, pyridine, kerosene, etc., and could not be called a beverage or be classified among intoxicating liquors. Federal laws now provide penalties for diversion by any method of this or any other lawful alcoholic product to beverage purposes.

J. M. DORAN,
Commissioner of Prohibition.

This is a most illuminating instance of cooperation between legitimate industry and the Government in making lawful alcoholic commodities totally unfit for beverage purposes and the fact that if the Federal laws are strictly observed and enforced, innocent people will not be harmed; and that those who deliberately manipulate and misuse such commodities are liable to severe penalties thereunder. Furthermore, section 4, Title II, of the national prohibition act provides that any person who shall knowingly sell any articles, such as denatured alcohol, medicines, toilet preparation, flavoring extracts, or other lawful alcoholic compounds "under circumstances from which the seller might reasonably deduce the intention of the purchaser to use them for," beverage purposes, shall be subject to the penalties provided in section 29 of that title.

The formula prescribed by the Bureau of Prohibition for the production of solidified fuels such as Sterno Canned Heat is identical with that required in the production of paints, varnishes, lacquers, polishes, automobile radiation solutions, inks, dyes, and innumerable other items of everyday commerce.

Special reference is made to Exhibit B on page 133 of Senate Document No. 195 of January 11, 1927. The major portion of this document is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting information in response to Senate Resolution 311, and the exhibit to which special reference is made is the report on the use of denaturants in industrial alcohol. This report was signed by J. M. Doran, then head of the industrial alcohol and chemical division, and a man who has had years of specialized experience in this field. His unique experience before being elevated to the office of Commissioner of Prohibition is a major factor in the success which has so far met his efforts in his present office. Anyone interested in the subject of denatured alcohol must read this report if he makes any claim to being informed.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 3, 1928.

Hon. GRANT M. HUDSON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In the event that Representative SIROVICH or his following should refer to an article in yesterday's New York Times (perhaps carried in other papers) of eight so-called "poison-liquor" cases, you can counter with the unequivocal statement that Dr. F. Fagan, head of the psychopathic ward, Bellevue Hospital, New York City, reports that in none of them was wood alcohol a factor and that the symptoms were those of ordinary alcoholism, and, he adds, he has not had a case of wood-alcohol poisoning for several years. But one of the patients in the group died and Dr. Alexander Gettler, toxicologist in the office of the medical examiner, New York City, states that the autopsy did not show the presence of wood alcohol but merely indicated death from alcoholism.

The above information came to me over the telephone after writing you this morning. It is being sent to you simply to prepare you should the specific publicity in question be mentioned during the course of your remarks.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES P. MCGOVERN.

WHAT CENSUS BUREAU FINDS

We know of only two compilations of figures that give a picture of the country as a whole. One is by the Census Bureau at Washington, the other by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. An extract from the Census Bureau report on deaths and death rates per 100,000 estimated population, in the registration area, registration States, and each State, from wood or denatured alcohol shows the following:

	1925	1924	1923	1922	1921
Number of deaths	182	180	143	201	194
Rate per 100,000	0.2	0.2	0.1	0.2	0.2

States showing 10 or more deaths in 1925 are the following:

	1925	1924	1923	1922	1921
California	17	14	14	12	6
Rate	0.4	0.4	0.4	0.3	0.2
New Jersey	10	6	10	34	11
Rate	0.3	0.2	0.3	1.0	0.3
New York	16	26	12	25	22
Rate	0.1	0.2	0.1	0.2	0.2
Ohio	12	30	11	8	15
Rate	0.2	0.5	0.2	0.1	0.3
Pennsylvania	15	7	8	16	12
Rate	0.2	0.1	0.1	0.2	0.1

In evaluating these figures we must again bear in mind that some of these deaths were due to drinking pure methanol. For example, the New York figures will show an enormous increase for 1926. In the summer of that year over 20 deaths were caused in Buffalo as a result of one batch of bootleg liquor, traced back to a shipment of German synthetic methanol. Of course this has no connection with denatured alcohol. Likewise, a few weeks ago three men died in Jersey City as the result of a drinking bout. Analysis of the liquor found showed pure methanol.

Only a few weeks ago the American Chemical Society heard the following from the chairman of its industrial alcohol committee:

"An ignorant belief that denatured alcohol without added poison would be a beverage, and that poison is added by the Government to make its use as a beverage dangerous; the vote-attracting possibilities of any measure that is aimed to protect the 'innocent' drinker of denatured alcohol or of illicit drinks made from it; and the vague hope that such agitation may result in changes that will make the bootlegger's work easier and the drinker's supply more plentiful and safer.

"No matter what the cause of this agitation may be we must not lose sight of the fact that denatured alcohol is unmistakably unfit for beverage purposes when sold, and that if criminals improve the taste and odor so that it appears to be potable without removing any possible poisonous character the guilt is theirs.

"The primary reason for denaturing alcohol is not to poison it but to render it unmistakably nonpotable, and the Government must insist on denaturants that are hard to remove in all denatured alcohols that are readily procurable and permitted to be used without stringent regulation."

We have purposely refrained from discussing the ethical aspects of "poison liquor." It is the business of health officers to consider all serious health hazards, regardless of the question as to whether the victim suffers as the result of a deliberately lawless act on the part of himself or others. Nevertheless we can not refrain from closing with the following sentence from the Journal of the American Medical Association (January 15, 1927):

"The records do not reveal a single human death from denatured alcohol when used in automobile radiators."

Opinions will differ as to what attitude should be taken in the case of a man who disregards the poison label on denatured alcohol and proceeds to indulge his appetite, unmindful of the caution placed there for his protection and of the odors and tastes provided as a further warning. Even those who are illiterate have no difficulty in interpreting the meaning of the skull and crossbones, for this insignia on a package conveys its warning in every language.

Opinions may also differ as to whether legitimate industry requiring alcohol as a raw material for the manufacture of many things which we all use should be compelled to take the risk of great fines and terms of imprisonment in case mildly denatured alcohol is diverted by a dishonest employee, or whether we shall adhere to the principle of supplying industry with what it can use, protecting this supply with a denaturant impossible to remove, yet not objectionable to the industrial process, regardless of whether it is toxic or not. It is clear, however, that industrial alcohol can not find its way into beverage uses unless criminally manipulated and unless all the warnings put there to safeguard the public are disregarded and more or less completely removed. There can be no difference of opinion as to the conscientious efforts of chemists in and outside the Government employ to obtain a denaturant that will at the same time protect the supply of industrial alcohol and cause no injury to that exceedingly small percentage of the population which insists upon the gratification of an appetite at all costs. The problem of denaturing industrial alcohol can be solved not through the attacks of inadequately informed though well-meaning persons, but by constructive, scientific contributions.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent of the gentleman from Maryland to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ACKERMAN). The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman from Maryland will allow the gentleman from Michigan to extend anything he pleases. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMPENSATION OF CERTAIN UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on the 19th of March the Civil Service Committee of the House began hearings on what is known as the Welch bill (H. R. 6518). Probably no piece of legislation considered by the House at this session has evoked more general interest among the Members of the House as well as the public at large.

On that day our committee was visited by a delegation of employees of the Federal Government, some 2,000, asking that Congress consider the question of an increase in their pay. Lengthy hearings have been had by the Civil Service Committee on the subject. Much useful information upon the subject of salaries and wages in private industry and the Federal service has been presented to our committee. No executive session has been had on the bill as yet, therefore I do not feel that I am in any way violating the rules of the House or my duty as a member of the committee when I bring the matter on the floor for discussion. My reason for doing this is because something like 200 Members of the House appeared either personally before the Civil Service Committee or were there by proxy to signify their approval and support of the Welch bill. Without in any way meaning to reflect upon the view of any Member, I have an idea that very few of the Members who indorsed the bill had had an opportunity to study it in detail and thus really understand just what they were indorsing. They were asked and importuned to indorse the project of increasing the salaries of the so-called "poor underpaid Federal employees." Upon that theory, and thinking, of course, that the bill in question would accomplish that result, they appeared before the committee and indorsed it. The big appeal of the Welch bill has been that it sought to relieve a condition among the lower salaried Federal employees, many of whom are now working at starvation wages, and when you have read in the press, editorially or in the news columns, comment upon this legislation, it has always been spoken of as legislation designed to do justice to the "underpaid employees." As a member of this committee, and speaking entirely for myself and on my own responsibility, I could not support the Welch bill as it stands at present, because I do not believe it accomplishes that purpose, and unless radical changes were made in it which would entirely change its whole philosophy I could not support it.

I want in the few moments granted me to engage your attention and put into the RECORD for the benefit of those who are not here just a few comments and observations on the bill, and if those comments and observations shall have the effect of provoking some study and discussion of the question, that we might all understand it better, then I shall feel abundantly repaid for imposing upon your time now.

In the first place, as we know, we are within a few weeks of the adjournment of this session of Congress, probably within five or six weeks, if we adjourn on May 19, which I understand is the tentative date that has been set. To my mind, the Welch bill has obstacles standing in the way of its immediate consideration or passage. In the first place, it is a most complicated measure. It seeks to approach the question of salary raise by rearranging the salary schedules in the classification act of 1923, as amended, and if you read it and study it in all of its long, complicated provisions, it is impossible for you to tell, just as it has been impossible for any of the governmental departments to tell, just what effect it will have on the salaries of Federal employees.

The philosophy of the Welch bill is that by increasing the salary range of the classified civil service there will thereby be an increase in the salary of the employees in these departments. That does not necessarily follow at all. It would be entirely possible for the personnel classification board by rearranging his grade to deprive him of any increase whatever. I do not suggest that this would be done, but it would be possible. Not only that, but there are other objections to the Welch bill that make it impossible to consider it hastily or give it that expeditious consideration which we must give if we hope to have relief at this session of Congress. In the first place, there is wide speculation as to whether the Welch bill will even affect the field service at all. If you examine the hearings, you will find that the question was asked a great many people, and they expressed some doubt and some apprehension as to whether or not, if the Welch bill were to become a law, its provisions would effect an increase in the salaries of the employees in the field service. That is because there has never been any classification of the field service of the Federal Government. A law was passed requiring the classification board to make a classification of the field service, but that has not been done. The salaries of the employees in the District of Columbia are fixed by the classification act, and as far as practicable the departmental heads are instructed in the various appropriation bills to make the salaries in the field conform to the salaries in the classification act; but there is no assurance whatever, when you pass the Welch bill, that the salaries of your constituents at home in the field are going to be in any way affected or raised by the provisions of that bill.

In the second place, it has a most controversial provision in it, and that is the idea of establishing a minimum wage. Personally, I do not believe that the idea of establishing a minimum wage is sound. I do not believe it can be successfully defended from the economic standpoint. I do not believe it is necessary to establish a minimum wage in order to pay living wages to the employees of the Government; and if you establish a pay roll upon any other theory than that of paying a person a reasonable value for the service rendered, you are violating a fundamental rule of economics. So that with that provision in it, the Welch bill would bring an endless controversy and make it doubtful of passage at this session of Congress.

More serious than that is the objection that nobody to date has been able to furnish a reliable estimate of the approximate cost of the Welch bill. The National Association of Federal Employees estimated the cost at $35,000,000, while the Bureau of Efficiency has estimated the approximate cost at $68,000,000, and the Bureau of the Budget has estimated it at $90,000,000. Nobody to date has been able to tell what it would cost, or what obligations would be imposed on the Federal Treasury because of the passage of that bill.

A still more fundamental objection to the philosophy of this legislation is the fact that we are told it will give relief to the "poor underpaid Federal employees," "the departmental clerks working now at almost starvation wages," the young ladies and young men in the departments drawing from $1,000 to $1,200 a year, with families to support. Let us see what the Welch bill does for them. Take the first classification, the clerical, administrative, and fiscal service; go to grade 1 of that service, the lowest grade, and you will find that the present salary range in the lowest grade is from $1,140 to $1,500. Under the provisions of the Welch bill that is increased from $1,500 to $1,740, or an increase of $360 in the minimum and $240 in the maximum.

But now when we drop down to grade 7 of the clerical, administrative, and fiscal service, under existing law the salary range is from $2,400 to $3,000. Under the Welch bill it is made to range from $3,100 to $3,400. It gives that class of employees a salary range increase of $700 at the bottom and $400 at the top. Then when you drop down still further to the highest-paid employees in that grade, or grade 14 of the clerical administrative and fiscal service, under existing law you find it is $7,500, and under the Welch bill the minimum is $9,000 and from there up to $10,000 to the maximum.

So when we are told that the Welch bill is to relieve the "underpaid Federal employees," we see that it gives the employees getting $1,200 now an increase of $300, and the employee who is now getting $7,500 an increase of $1,500.

That is the philosophy of this bill right straight through from the beginning to the end when you come to analyze it. Personally I can not subscribe to that theory of legislation.

Not only that, gentlemen, but let me draw a few practical illustrations of what this bill will do, as developed in the hearings to which I have referred. I quote from the testimony of Mr. Walter P. Taylor, in the Forestry Service, from Tucson, Ariz. He gives some valuable information as to the salaries paid under the classification act and the various phases of it. I asked him this specific question, because I wanted to get, if I could, a practical illustration of how this bill would operate upon the salaries of the employees: A typist in the Veterans' Bureau, who is in grade 1 of the clerical administrative and fiscal service at the present time, with an average salary of $1,320, under the Welch bill would get an increase of $300 a year, or $25 per month. Under the Welch bill the forest supervisor at Tucson, Ariz., at present receiving a salary of $5,400, would get an increase of $600, or an increase of $50 per month.

Now, I find upon questioning this gentleman a little further that this department forester at Tucson, Ariz., in 1914 was receiving $3,000 and in 1927 was receiving $5,400, and now we propose under the Welch bill to give him a salary of $6,000, while at the same time we are giving the young lady in the Veterans' Bureau, the typist to whom I have referred, an increase of only $300 or perhaps less.

Not only that, but I find that forest rangers in 1914 received $1,122 and in 1917 received $1,761, and under the Welch bill they would receive $2,161, or a raise of $400. In addition to that their quarters are furnished.

Now, gentlemen, my time is almost up and I do not want to delay you, but in a word that is the philosophy of the Welch bill. I want to see enacted at this session of Congress legislation that will relieve the employees in the lower grades of salaries. It is entirely possible that many of the so-called higher-paid employees are not receiving what they should. I do not know as to that; but at least it can not be fairly said that one receiving a salary of, say, $3,000 plus is not receiving a living wage. The real emergency, however, calls for relief for the low-salaried employees. I want to see that relief. I believe that the Members of this House would want to do that. I believe the Committee on the Civil Service would want to do that, and I believe the administration would approve of that. Therefore I have drawn a bill and introduced it, the bill H. R. 12696, and upon it you will need to have no further hearings, and you could figure the cost of it on the back of a postage stamp, and it will relieve the underpaid employees. It provides for a flat increase in the salary of governmental employees of $300 a year.

A bill (H. R. 12696) to increase the compensation for certain civilian employees of the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia, and to amend the salary rates contained in the classification act of 1923, as amended

Be it enacted, etc., That each annual rate of compensation prescribed in section 13 of the classification act of 1923, as amended, is hereby increased by $300; and each hourly rate of compensation prescribed in such section, as amended, is hereby increased by 12½ cents.

SEC. 2. That the compensation of all civilian employees of the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia shall be increased in the amount of $300 per annum, whether paid at per diem rates, by the hour, by piecework, or per annum.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the following:

Employees paid from the postal revenues and sums which may be advanced from the Treasury to meet deficiencies in postal revenues, except employees of the Post Office Department in the District of Columbia, who shall be included; employees in the recognized trades and crafts whose pay is adjustable from time to time through wage boards or similar authority to accord with the commercial rates paid locally for the same class of service; employees whose duties require only a portion of their time, except charwomen, who shall be included; persons employed by or through corporations, firms, or individuals, acting for or on behalf of, or as agents of the United States or any department or independent establishment of the Government of the United States in connection with construction work or the operation of plants; employees who receive a part of their pay from any outside sources under cooperative arrangements with the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia; employees who serve voluntarily or receive only a nominal compensation; and employees who may be provided with special allowances because of their service in foreign countries.

SEC. 4. This act shall take effect from the date of its enactment.

Now, gentlemen, what does that do? It gives to your poor underpaid employee in the custodial service, who is now getting $900 a year and can barely live on it, $25 a month extra. It goes on up the line and gives that increase in salary to all the employees, and, as I say, you can figure the cost of it on the back of a postage stamp. It is easy of administration, it will provoke no argument, and its cost is very much less than the estimated cost of the Welch bill.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman has it handy, how many Government employees in the District of Columbia receive less than $900 a year?

Mr. WOODRUM. I can not give the number of employees who receive less than $900 a year, but I can say this: That there are 45,000 employees in the District of Columbia who would be affected by the provisions of the Welch bill. I do not have the figures which the gentleman asks for.

Mr. SNELL. I did not suppose there were any on full-time pay who were receiving less than that.

Mr. WOODRUM. There may not be, but there are quite a number who receive $1,000 and $1,200 and many who receive $1,160 and a great many who receive less than $1,500.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is a large class of employees receiving $1,160?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. The army of employees which you saw marching over to the Civil Service Committee were in the class of employees receiving from $1,000 to $1,500.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Were they full-time employees?

Mr. WOODRUM. In answer to the gentleman I will say I think they were full-time employees who came to the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would that $300 apply to the field employees?

Mr. WOODRUM. It applies to everybody. If my bill is given consideration by the committee, it will apply to everybody in the field and to those in the classified service. The first section of the bill provides for a flat increase of $300 to all the grades of pay under section 13 of the classification act, in order that by raising the salaries of employees we would not conflict with or confuse the grades now established.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Would it be possible for the gentleman to tell us how many employees all together his bill would affect?

Mr. WOODRUM. It has been estimated in the figures furnished by the Bureau of Efficiency that there are 45,000 employees in the District of Columbia who would be affected by the Welch bill, and that there are 90,000 in the field service who would be affected by the provisions of that bill. Therefore there would be 135,000 employees affected by the terms of this legislation at $300, which would make an increase in the annual pay roll of $40,500,000. My bill affects everyone contemplated in the Welch bill. So there would be no controversy about it. The administration could pass on it in five minutes, and, gentlemen, you would give relief where relief is needed. I am willing to subscribe to that doctrine, but I do not subscribe to the doctrine of giving most to the man who has the most.

I have brought this matter to the floor of the House because 200 Members of Congress have expressed their interest in it by appearing before our committee. I know I can speak for the distinguished and able chairman of our committee by saying that the Civil Service Committee wants to do what it can to meet this great appeal that has been made to it for relief, and we are going to do the best we can; but I offer a plan which is simple and which will accomplish just what it has been said is desired to be accomplished by the passage of the Welch bill. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, the majority report on H. R. 7940 has been filed to-day. It was understood in the committee that minority members desiring to file minority views should have five legislative days after the filing of the majority report in which to file such views. I would like to ask leave on behalf of the members of the minority to file such views within five days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the minority members of the Committee on Agriculture may have five legislative days in which to file their views. Is there objection?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it not possible for the gentleman, after all the study he has given to this legislation, to prepare his report in five hours?

Mr. FORT. I prefer to have the five days.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Very well; then I will not object.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Was not such consent granted the other day at the request of the gentleman from Tennessee on behalf of Mr. ASWELL and other members of the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that this leave was asked for and granted the other day.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE], as I remember it, was with respect to his own minority views and not for the filing of general minority views?

Mr. FORT. I do not know that there is a general one.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, the request of the gentleman from New York was amended by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who spoke of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] and others who might be in the minority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that that is the case.

EXPORT TRADE

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up the resolution (H. Res. 150) and ask that the same may be read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 150

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8927, to amend the act entitled "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed four hours, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order the bill H. R. 8972. I have had no calls for time to debate the rule except I think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] desires 10 minutes.

Mr. POU. I will say to my colleague that I would like to have 10 minutes which I may yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes. The purpose of the bill, in a general way, I think, is generally understood by the House. Full discussion will be permitted under the rule. Four hours is provided for general debate. This bill will be considered under the general rules of the House and free opportunity will be given for amendment. With this understanding, I feel that it is hardly necessary to go into details with respect to the bill while the rule is being considered.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules and I understand there is no opposition to the rule.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] to yield as he may see fit.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no opposition to the rule, but there is opposition to the bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Surely.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules felt that this was a measure that the House should have an opportunity to consider. The fact there was a unanimous report from the committee does not mean that the minority on the Committee on Rules will support the measure. It was decided that in view of the importance of the measure, and in view of the sentiment of the House, as we understood it, the House should have an opportunity to vote on the measure. This is all I care to say with respect to the rule.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, my inquiry is relative to the disqualification of certain Members of the House to vote upon this measure, and I ask the indulgence of the Chair so that I may state the facts upon which I base my inquiry. I shall, of course, be guided by the Speaker's ruling on the matter of raising the point of order.

Under the rule just adopted, H. R. 8927, a bill "To amend the act entitled 'An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes,'" is now before the House for consideration. I make the inquiry at this time, as I believe that a ruling from the Chair will not only clarify the situation, but will save considerable time if the question were first raised immediately prior to the taking of a vote on the passage of the bill.

The bill under consideration permits an association of individuals or corporations for the purpose of engaging in certain import trade. Import trade as described in the bill itself means solely trade or commerce in crude rubber, potash, sisal, or other raw materials certified by the Secretary of Commerce as coming within the definition of the bill, to wit, to be controlled by any foreign government, combination, or monopoly. While the formation of a pool as to sisal and potash under the bill may be in its formative stage, it is safe to say that it has not progressed to such a stage as to make its components easily identified. As to the other raw materials, which may later on be certified, an association under the bill is so remote as not to come within the purpose of my inquiry. When we come to the crude rubber, however, we know exactly just who this bill will affect. The reason we know this is that the pool or association which would be legalized under this bill is now in existence. Not only the hearings before the committee disclosed this fact, as well as the identity of the components of the pool, but their public activities, the purchases made, and the obtaining of huge credit leave no doubt as to its existence and the corporations that form part of this pool or association. It is understood that the pool or association is now composed of the United States Rubber, B. F. Goodrich Co., Goodyear Tire & Rubber, Firestone Tire & Rubber, Fisk Rubber, General Motors Corporation, Kelly-Springfield Tire Co., Ajax Rubber Co., Willys-Overland Co., Dodge Bros., Packard Motor Car Co., and the Studebaker Corporation. This bill affects actually not all the rubber companies in the United States, not all the automobile companies in the United States, but a limited number now known and now subject to identification. There are a certain selected few corporations now in a pool and now operating.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As soon as I conclude——

Mr. MICHENER. But the gentleman has said that these people constitute a certain selected few. As a matter of fact, is it not true, and does not the gentleman know, that when this pool was formed that all buyers or users of rubber in America were asked to join, and that these concerns belonging did become members, and by virtue of the existence of that very pool the price of rubber was brought down from $1.20 a pound until to-day we buy it for less than 42 cents a pound, and the consumer is the ultimate beneficiary of this law if it becomes effective and operates as contemplated?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will assume the facts stated by the gentleman, but not his conclusion that the consumer is the ultimate beneficiary of the legislation under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, assuming it to be true that others were invited to join and did not avail themselves of the privilege that is not the question; the important point is that there was a pool formed by certain corporations now known and identified. The bill, if enacted into law, will result in a direct benefit to certain now known corporations. This bill does not affect all corporations in the United States, it does not affect all automobile corporations in the United States, but its conceded purpose will bring advantages and privileges to a certain small group of corporations now in existence. Therefore this bill affecting particular corporations, I desire to inquire whether a Member directly interested in that corporation as a stockholder comes within the prohibition and intent of section 1 of rule 8 of the rules of this House. In this connection I desire to call attention to the ruling of Mr. Speaker Blaine of February 28, 1873, found in section 5955 of Hinds' Precedents.

That ruling seems to me to be directly in point, and with the indulgence of the Speaker I will read it in full:

A bill affecting a particular corporation being before the House, the Speaker held that a Member directly interested in that corporation as a shareholder had no right to vote.

Instance wherein the Committee of the Whole reported a question of order to the House for decision.

On February 28, 1873, the Senate amendments to the legislative appropriation bill were under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and a vote by tellers was taken on an amendment relating to the Central Pacific Railroad.

Before the announcement of this vote, Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, made the point of order that Mr. Samuel Hooper, of Massachusetts, who had voted, was personally interested in the railroad, and therefore not entitled to vote under the rule.

The Chairman [Henry L. Dawes] said:

"That is a question of fact, which the Chair is not called upon to decide. The Chair rules that no Member interested directly in the effect of this vote is entitled to vote, neither the gentleman from Massachusetts nor any other Member of the House. If any gentleman violates this rule in voting, he is subject to such discipline in this House as the House itself shall determine."

Further objection being made, Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, moved that the committee rise and report the question to the House for its decision. This motion being agreed to, Speaker Blaine held:

"The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole reported that the committee have had under consideration the Senate amendments to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; that the ninety-third amendment of the Senate being reached (relating to the payment of interest by the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad companies), the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] raised the point of order upon the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] that the latter gentleman, being directly interested, had no right to vote. Upon that question the Chair will state that as a matter of parliamentary law it is laid down in the rules that where the interest is direct a Member has no right to vote. In this case, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] be a stockholder in that road the Chair would rule he had no right to vote. It differs from the case of national banks, which has been brought up in several instances, in the fact that this is a single corporation and is not of general interest held throughout the country by all classes of people in all communities. It was long ago ruled by Speaker Winthrop, in a decision in the Massachusetts Legislature, which has ever since been held to be a guide on that subject, on the point being made against a gentleman who had some corporate interest in some corporations which were general throughout the Commonwealth, and it was shown to be an interest in no sense individual and could not be narrowed down to a question of personal interest as separate and distinct from the general interest. In reference to the question of national banks, which circulate the currency of the whole Nation, whose stockholders are numbered by thousands, residing in every community, the Chair would hold no point could be made against a Member, because there is no interest there separate and distinct from the general public interest. But if a stockholder in a single railroad corporation, as in this case, has his vote challenged it would be the duty of the Chair to hold, if he is actually a stockholder of the road, that he has no right to vote. * * * The Chair so decides without any knowledge in this particular case. It is for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper], whose delicacy the Chair knows and cheerfully recognizes, to relieve the House from any embarrassment on that question.

"Mr. Hooper withdrew his vote."

It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that in the case just cited, the decision applied to one corporation, while the bill under consideration will affect six or seven corporations. I will, of course, concede that in the ruling of Mr. Speaker Blaine the particular corporation was named in the bill, while the bill under consideration does not mention by name any particular corporation. I submit, however, that the purpose of the rubber pool is so clear, its existence so certain, its activities so gigantic that there can be no doubts of its existence and component members.

Now, it will be argued that it would be impossible to disqualify a large class of the membership of the House when the bill is general in its terms. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, while at the first glance it may give the impression that it is general, its purpose, I repeat, is so well known and established that there can be no doubt as to the corporations directly affected and benefited. That being so, clearly it brings it within the purview and ruling by the Speaker of the House in 1873.

I want to submit, Mr. Speaker, that when it is argued that the Speaker can not go beyond the bill that he is limited by the fact that the bill does mention any particular corporation—such an argument is not in keeping with modern sense of legislative propriety.

The question here is one of propriety, one of public decency. For instance, the attitude of Members of the New Jersey delegation in 1839—when the question of seating the entire New Jersey delegation was under consideration each Member voted to seat their colleagues but did not vote on his own matter—might have been technically proper in those days, but to-day it would not be so accepted. Such action would be considered poor taste and indelicate in our time. There is a new standard of requirement in the exercise of public duty, and the question is not whether by looking at the bill a Member may be involved; the question is whether the Member who votes can turn around and face his 434 colleagues and look them square in the eye.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the question raised by my colleague is one that has been raised on this floor several times. Fortunately there is a long line of precedents bearing directly on this proposition and which are on all fours with the proposition before the House at the present time.

In the limited time I have been able to look over the precedents, the prevailing idea in each one of the decisions is exactly the same; and that is this:

That whenever a piece of general legislation is before the House which affects a general class, no individual Member of the House, because he happens to be a member of that class, is disqualified from voting.

The gentleman from New York has referred to the decision in 1873, Hinds, 5955. Unfortunately, that decision is not on all fours with the proposition now before us; but if he had turned back to Hinds, 5952, he would have found a decision by the same Speaker, Mr. Blaine, about one year after the one cited by my friend Mr. LAGUARDIA, of New York, which deals with precisely the same situation we have before us now. Probably this decision is the most complete decision ever rendered on this subject. Mr. Speaker Blaine went into the whole proposition very carefully, completely, and elaborately, and a few years ago Speaker Clark had the same question before the House, and he quoted quite fully from Speaker Blaine's decision and fully agreed with the decision of Mr. Blaine at that time. In brief, it was that when legislation pertains to a general class there is nothing in it that disqualifies an individual Member from voting.

To bring it down to recent times and within the memory of all of us, no one would have thought of the question of qualification of 50 or 60 Members of this House who had had distinguished service in the World War—and my friend LAGUARDIA was one of them—when they voted on legislation that had to do with hospitalization, compensation, and even bonus. Each one of these Members might come under the provisions of this legislation and sometime receive benefits from that law. But no one ever questioned the right of those Members to vote on that question for the simple reason that each one was a Member of a large class of three or four million men that were affected by that legislation, and it was in no way personal legislation as far as he was concerned.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman compare the veterans' legislation and the vote on that legislation by ex-service men with the vote by stockholders of the General Motors Corporation?

Mr. SNELL. That is not a fair question, for this reason: This is a parliamentary situation and has nothing to do with the merits of the bill in hand, and we must treat the facts exactly as they are, and what you or I think about the legislation has nothing to do with it.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. In a moment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has referred to Hinds' Precedents, section 5955. That precedent refers to a bill "affecting a particular corporation." According to the gentleman's own statement, there are at least 11 large corporations affected by this bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. This bill does not affect any particular corporation. This does not affect a particular pool or combination. This simply authorizes the formation of importing pools or combinations if and when the Secretary of Commerce finds it necessary and so certifies.

Mr. SNELL. And furthermore, any man in the United States who uses rubber in the manufacture of goods may come in under this general law.

Mr. MICHENER. And every farmer who uses sisal on his farm would be directly benefited if this law should become effective and operate as contemplated.

Mr. SNELL. That is what we hope will be the final effect of the law. For that reason the gentleman's first premise is not correct. This bill applies to general corporations in the rubber business, with thousands of stockholders, rather than to a specific or special one, and the precedent that he refers to in Hinds' Precedents—section 5955—is purely an individual railroad. If that bill had affected all the railroads of the country, it would have been an entirely different proposition.

Mr. MICHENER. And may I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] if he thinks this decision goes so far as to prevent a farmer Member of Congress from voting for the McNary-Haugen farm relief bill, because he was to receive a direct benefit from its passage.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That would come squarely within the decisions that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is urging.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] were to prevail, every single Member of this House would be disqualified from voting for a revenue bill which reduced the tax on his salary, because every salary is subject to tax.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, the rulings cover that.

Mr. SNELL. The prevailing idea in every one of these decisions is well summed up in the statement in Hinds' Precedents, section 5952:

> Where the subject matter before the House affects a class rather than individuals, the personal interest of Members who belong to that class is not such as disqualifies them from voting.

As far as I am able to find, there is not a single exception to that rule, and I can see no reason for raising a point of order such as the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has raised.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] has already raised the point that I wanted to call attention to. If what the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] contends for is upheld, then one-half of the membership of the House from the Corn Belt States would be disqualified from voting on the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not under the decisions.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I may speak for myself personally. I am directly interested in farm lands, and when I vote for the McNary-Haugen bill I know that it will affect my own personal interest, but I claim the right to vote for it none the less.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not the gentleman think there is sufficient doubt about his receiving any benefit from the legislation in question? [Laughter.]

Mr. COLE of Iowa. It is at least the purpose of the bill to benefit farmers and farm-land owners, and my vote will be cast in consciousness of that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is glad to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. The gentleman was kind enough to notify the Chair some days ago that he would probably present a parliamentary inquiry such as he has just made. The Chair has had some opportunity to examine the precedents, and is quite familiar with the precedents, even without this particular examination.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] raises the question whether any Member of this House who happens to be interested as a stockholder in any of the corporations which may be affected by the legislation provided for in H. R. 8927 is qualified to vote on the bill. The gentleman from New York quoted a decision of Mr. Speaker Blaine, announced in 1873, which hinged upon the question as to whether a Member who was at that time a stockholder in the Central Pacific Railroad had the right to vote on a bill which might directly affect that road. Mr. Speaker Blaine in rendering that decision laid stress upon the proposition that this was one single corporation and not a class of corporations. In section 5955, Hinds' Precedents, the summary of the decision is as follows:

> A bill affecting a particular corporation being before the House the Speaker held that a Member directly interested in that corporation as a shareholder had no right to vote.

A year later the question was raised as to whether Members interested in banks should have the right to vote on legislation which might possibly affect the financial condition of those banks. The summary of the decision on that question as announced in Hinds' Precedents, section 5952, is as follows:

> Where the subject matter before the House affects a class rather than individuals, the personal interest of Members who belong to the class, is not such as to disqualify them from voting.
> The power of the House to deprive one of its Members of the right to vote on any question is doubtful.

At that time the point was raised by Mr. Speer, of Pennsylvania, that certain Members holding stock in national banks were not entitled to vote "being personally interested in the pending question," and he referred to three Members of the House who had stock in national banks.

The ruling of Mr. Speaker Blaine on that question is so elaborate and so thoroughly covers the whole subject, and so thoroughly applies to this case that, while it is long, the Chair thinks the House will be interested in hearing the decision of Mr. Blaine. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The Chair will say that the question in fact lies somewhat back of the rules of the House, and while the Chair is going to give his opinion upon the rule and construe it, he begs to make a remark that goes somewhat deeper than the rule. When a very distinguished predecessor in this chair, Mr. Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, occupied it, as is familiar to the House, a question arose upon the amendment to the Constitution changing the mode of counting the votes for the election of President and Vice President. The rule at that time was peremptory that the Speaker should not vote except in the case of a tie. It has since been changed. The vote, if the Chair remembers correctly, as handed up to Mr. Macon was 83 in favor of the amendment and 42 opposed to it. The amendment did not have the necessary two-thirds and the rule absolutely forbade the Speaker to vote, and yet he did vote, and the amendment became engrafted in the Constitution of the United States upon that vote; and he voted upon the distinct declaration that the House had no right to adopt any rule abridging the right of a Member to vote; that he voted upon his responsibility to his conscience and to his constituents; that although that rule was positive and peremptory, it did not have any effect upon his right. He voted, and, if the Chair remembers correctly, it was attempted to contest afterwards by some judicial process whether the amendment was legally adopted. But the movement proved abortive, and the amendment is now a part of the Constitution. Now, the question comes back whether or not the House has a right to say to any Member that he shall not vote upon any question, and especially if the House has a right to say that if 147 Members come here, each owning one share of national bank stock (which there is no law to prohibit them from holding), they shall by reason of that very fact be incapacitated from legislating on this whole question.
>
> If there is a majority of one in the House that holds each a single share of stock, and it incapacitates the Members from voting, then, of course, the House can not approach that legislation; it stops right there. * * * Now, it has always been held that where legislation affected a class as distinct from individuals a Member might vote. Of course, everyone will see the impropriety of a sitting Member in the case of a contest voting on his own case. That is so palpably an individual personal interest that there can be no question about it. It comes right down to that single man. There is no class in the matter at all. But where a man does not stand in any way distinct from a class, the uniform ruling of the American House of Representatives and of the British Parliament, from which we derive our rulings, have been one way. In the year 1871—the Chair is indebted for the suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. G. F. Hoar, but he remembers the case himself—when a bill was pending in the British House of Commons to abolish the right to sell commissions in the army, which officers had always heretofore enjoyed, and to give a specific sum of money to each army officer in lieu thereof, there were many officers of the army members of the British House of Commons, as there always are, and the point was made that those members could not vote on that bill because they had immediate and direct pecuniary interest in it. The House of Commons did not sustain that point, because the officers referred to only had that interest which was in common with the entire class of army officers outside of the house—many thousands in number.
> Since I have had the honor of being a Member of this House, on the floor and in the chair, many bills giving bounty to soldiers have been voted on here. We have the honor of the presence on this floor of many gentlemen distinguished in the military service who had the benefit of those bounties directly and indirectly. It never could be made a point that they were incapacitated from voting on those bills. They did not enjoy the benefit arising from the legislation distinct and separate from thousands of men in the country who had held similar positions. It was not an interest distinct from the public interest in any way. * * * And the same with pensions. * * * And further, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, has well said, if it should be decided to-day that a Member who holds a share of national-bank stock shall not vote on a question relating to national banks, then the question might come up whether a Member interested in the manufacture of cotton shall have the right to vote upon the tariff on cotton goods; or whether a Member representing a cotton State shall vote upon the question whether cotton shall be taxed, for that interest is largely represented here by gentlemen engaged in the planting of cotton. And so you can go through the whole round of business and find upon this floor gentlemen who, in common with many citizens outside of this House, have an interest in questions before the House. But they do not have that interest separate and distinct from a class, and, within the meaning of the rule, distinct from the public interest. The Chair, therefore, has no hesitation in saying that he does not sustain the point of order presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Speer].

The SPEAKER. That decision, so far as the Chair knows, stands to-day, and has never been overruled or controverted.

On December 22, 1914, it was quoted with approval by Mr. Speaker Clark. Precisely the same question arose then.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobson] raised the question as to whether Members of the House interested in a certain class of corporations had the right to vote, and after quoting the ruling of Mr. Speaker Blaine with approval Speaker Clark said:

> If there was a bill here affecting one institution, if you call it that, the Chair would be inclined to rule that a Member interested in it pecuniarily could not vote, but where it affects a whole class he can vote.

Unquestionably the bill before us affects a very large class. The Chair has no information as to how many stockholders there may be in these various rubber companies. The Chair would be surprised if there were not hundreds of thousands of American citizens who were stockholders in these companies specifically referred to by the gentleman from New York, and possibly there may be a very large number of others who are directly interested in the outcome of this legislation.

Following the decision of Speaker Blaine and Speaker Clark the Chair is very clear upon the question that Members, whether they may be stockholders or not in any of these corporations, have a perfect right to vote. The Chair would be in some doubt as to whether it would be within the power of the Speaker to say whether a Member interested might vote or not in any case. Certainly it would not be within the power of the Chair to deny a Member the right to vote except in the case where the legislation applied to one and only one corporation. In this case it applies to a large class. The Chair is absolutely clear in his mind, and in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York holds that in his opinion the Members of the House, whether interested or not, have the right to vote on this particular measure.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to control the time of those in favor of this legislation, and that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] be permitted to control it for those in opposition to this legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the four hours' time allowed under the rule be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8927, to amend the act entitled "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8927, with Mr. LUCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8927, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], the author of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to enable the American consumer to more effectively combat foreign monopolies in their control of the production and exportation of certain essential commodities and the charging of exorbitant prices for those commodities. In drafting the legislation we made use of the terms and provisions of the Webb-Pomerene Export Trade Act by extending similar provisions to associations engaged in importing crude rubber, potash, sisal, and certain other raw materials not produced in the United States in sufficient quantities to meet our own needs, and which are subject to monopolistic control abroad.

The Webb-Pomerene Export Trade Act was passed in 1918. It provides that the antitrust laws shall not be so construed as to prevent the association together of American concerns where the association is entered into for the sole purpose of engaging in export trade. Such associations are exempted from the provisions of our antitrust laws, providing they are not used to restrain trade within the United States or to artificially enhance prices or substantially lessen competition within our own country. In order to enforce the provisions of the act against any abuse in this country the Federal Trade Commission has certain regulatory power over these trade associations. If any one of these associations acts so as to artificially enhance prices or substantially lessen competition, or otherwise act in restraint of trade, then it is subject to all of the provisions of the antitrust laws. In other words, the exemption afforded by the Webb-Pomerene Act then ceases to be effective.

The demand for the enactment of the export trade act extended over a period of two or three years and sprang from a combination in Europe of European buying power. In order to more effectively purchase raw materials and manufactured products that were being raised and manufactured in this country, European countries combined their buying power and made that a problem for the American producer and the American manufacturer, and it was in order to meet this combined buying power abroad that the Webb law was passed in 1918.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That was during the time we were at war?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

This act has been on the statute books for 10 years. To-day there are 55 export trade associations which have been organized under its provisions. The total annual exports made through these associations in 1926—the last year on which figures were available—amounted to $200,000,000. The products handled by these export trade associations were numerous and diversified, as will appear from the annual report of the Federal Trade Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1927, page 22 thereof, from which I quote as follows:

> Commodities exported include raw materials and manufactured products shipped to every corner of the globe.
> Lumber and wood products exported during 1926, including pine, fir, redwood, walnut and hardwoods, turpentine and rosin, wooden tools, barrel shooks, and clothespins totaled about $35,700,000. Exports of metals, including copper, zinc, iron, and steel products, machinery, railway equipment, pipes, and valves, amounted to $56,500,000. Chemical products, including caustic soda, soda ash, liquid chlorine, soda pulp, paints, and varnish, totaled $3,100,000. Raw materials, such as phosphate rock, crude sulphur, etc., amounted to about $14,300,000. Paper, abrasives, cotton and rubber goods, buttons, and miscellaneous manufactured products totaled $55,900,000. Foodstuffs, including milk, meat, sugar, corn products, flour, canned salmon, and dried fruit, totaled about $35,000,000.

Let me repeat: These associations were made legal in order that the American producer could more effectively meet the combined buying power of his European customer.

During this entire period of 10 years the powers therein granted have not been abused. My authority for this statement is the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment there?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Is the gentleman familiar with the complaints that have been filed with the Federal Trade Commission under the Webb-Pomerene Act for violations on the part of those who received permission to pool their interests?

Mr. NEWTON. No; I know of no such complaints.

Mr. CELLER. Does not the gentleman know there are a considerable number of complaints on file there?

Mr. NEWTON. I know there has been none.

Mr. CELLER. There are a number of such complaints.

Mr. NEWTON. Then the gentleman and I do not understand each other.

Mr. WELLER. If the gentleman will permit, there were a number of complaints filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission, but none of those complaints has ever been taken into court, and there has been no court decision, and there has never been a conviction or a penalty imposed.

Mr. NEWTON. I know this. I took the matter up with the Department of Justice and was advised that they knew of no instance where there had been an abuse of the powers granted. I then took the matter up with the Federal Trade Commission and inquired first of the general counsel and then of the special assistant in charge of Webb Act matters and was informed by both persons that there had been no complaints whatever against any of these export trade associations.

Mr. CELLER. Were there any violations under the Wilson Tariff Act, which is tied up with the Webb-Pomerene Act, so that they are the same thing?

Mr. NEWTON. All I know is what I have said, and I got it from the best authority there is in the Department of Justice and in the Federal Trade Commission.

Both before and especially since the war reports have come in from time to time of efforts by foreign monopolies including governmental monopolies to control the production or exportation of certain raw materials essential to our economic welfare. Something like five years ago Congress appropriated substantial moneys for an investigation by the Department of Commerce with the idea of ascertaining the growth and extent of these monopolistic controls. This work was effectively done and while it was nearing completion the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] our floor leader, introduced a resolution for a congressional investigation by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of these controls and their effect upon our trade and industry. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce went into the matter promptly and thoroughly and reported to the House on March 13, 1926. The report is No. 555 of the Sixty-ninth Congress, first session. The committee found that there were about 70 commodities which we did not produce in sufficient quantities and which were either controlled by foreign monopolies or were susceptible of control. In presenting the report on behalf of the committee, I spoke somewhat at length on the floor of the House, and to those who may be interested, my remarks will be found on page 7105 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 10, 1926. The committee made certain specific findings as to the commodities controlled and made certain recommendations. Most of those controls still continue. Practically all of them exact unfair prices from the American consumer. Among the commodities now under actual control by these foreign monopolies are the following: Rubber, sisal, potash, long-staple cotton, coffee, iodine, camphor, mercury, nitrates, quinine, kauri used in varnishes, citric acids, citrate of lime, and possibly others. The total value of the imports on these commodities in 1926 amounted to $932,000,000. They constituted 21 per cent of our total imports for that year. The year is typical. I am appending a table showing the various commodities under control, the imports valued in thousands, the countries from which the importations are chiefly made, the percentage of our imports on that commodity from those countries, and so forth.

These foreign monopolistic controls have certain common characteristics. They are confined to those commodities where there is a preponderating production in one country. It will likewise be found that in that country the percentage of consumption as compared with production is exceedingly small. It will also be found that the country of preponderating consumption consumes a very substantial portion of the commodity produced in the world, but produces practically none. All of this will be shown in the following table. I have not the time to read it, but, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I shall offer several tables, I now ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks. I do not want to take up time in the reading of tables.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that I mentioned during the fore part of my remarks that there were about 75 commodities produced abroad which were susceptible of control and that about 15 or 16 were now under control. I now present another table showing essential commodities which we import and which are susceptible of monopolistic control abroad but are not yet under control. They total $1,262,380,000 during the year 1926, and constituted 28½ per cent of our imports that year, that is, in value. Figuring in commodities now under control and those susceptible of control we find that the total for the year 1926 amounted to $2,194,668,000, and constituted

49½ per cent of all of our imports for that year. A glance at the commodities mentioned will show how essential they are in our industrial lines. The table is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, now let us get back to those commodities that are already under foreign monopolistic control.

These controls have already cost the American consumer hundreds of millions of dollars. I shall take up certain specific commodities separately so as to demonstrate beyond any question of a doubt of the tremendous burden of these controls upon our industries. I shall use charts in order to more graphically present the situation.

CRUDE RUBBER

Crude rubber in dollars and cents is our greatest import. It supplanted silk in this respect several years ago. It is not produced in this country. The production of crude rubber is largely in the British and the Dutch East Indies. In 1927 the British possessions produced 54 per cent of the world's production of crude rubber. When the Stevenson plan was put into effect in 1922 they produced 67 per cent of the world's rubber. The United States, while producing no crude rubber, consumes 65 per cent of the total world production. The conditions were, therefore, ideal for control. The average cost of producing crude rubber is 18 cents per pound. The average price of rubber at New York during the years 1914 to 1918, inclusive, was 67.41 cents per pound. These were war-time prices. The average yearly price in 1919 was 48.7; in 1920 it was 36.3; in 1921 it had dropped to 16.3 and in 1922 it was 17.5. For two years, therefore, it was below the average cost of production. The British colonial secretary appointed a committee, of which Sir James Stevenson was made chairman. The committee made its recommendations for limiting exportations of crude rubber; the British colonial secretary adopted them and submitted them to the legislative councils of the several East Indian possessions producing crude rubber. They were then made effective.

The announced intention was to restrict the exportation and to incidentally curtail production by a plan which would maintain a fair or stabilized price ranging from 24 cents to 36 cents per pound. The 36-cent level was the maximum expected at the outset, while 30 cents was the pivotal price on which increased output was permitted. This latter figure would yield a fair profit, while 36 cents would give a handsome profit, even on the higher production-cost plantations. The plan limited exports to a percentage of a fixed or arbitrary standard production assigned to each plantation. The original standard was based on the general yield of 1919–20. Since 1922–23 the plantations have been reassessed each year on a new basis, thereby allowing for new areas reaching maturity, higher yield per acre, and so forth. It takes about seven years to plant and develop a rubber tree into production. Under this plan the permitted exports automatically rise or fall quarterly as the price fluctuates above or below the 30-cent fair price level, providing, however, that the British colonial office authorizes the change. In May, 1926, the 30-cent price level was replaced by a 42-cent level. This still remains the pivotal price. The average yearly prices of crude rubber (plantation ribbed smoked sheets) at New York since 1922 is as follows:

1923	29.45
1924	26.20
1925	72.46
1926	48.50

The standard production officially announced for Malaya and Ceylon was 330,000 tons the first restriction year (1922–23). This figure was substantially the then potential or capacity production. My recollection is that the standard quota per acre was the same in certain regions, but that there was a difference as between regions. In no case was the original assessment permitted to exceed 400 pounds per acre per annum. In accordance with the plan a certain percentage of this so-called standard production is allocated to each plantation for exportation in each quarter year, depending upon the average price of crude rubber during the preceding quarter and the action of the British Colonial Office. This percentage has run from 50 per cent up. During the entire period of control, from November 1, 1922, to January 1, 1928, it has averaged only 69 per cent of the standard production. Therefore, during the entire control period it can be said that the exportation of potential production has been restricted about one-third. If a planter exports more than the allowable percentage he must pay a heavy export tax. This tax is set not only upon the excess over and above his percentage, but upon the entire amount of crude rubber exported. The tax is prohibitory because it is sufficiently substantial as to be confiscatory. It is, therefore, effective.

How has that monopolistic control affected the price of crude rubber in this country? That question can best be answered by Chart No. 1 (see following page), which I shall explain in detail. It shows the effect of the Stevenson restriction scheme on the price of crude rubber in this country and covers the period running from January 1, 1922, until about the 1st of April, 1928. The line marked, "Production cost per pound, plantation rubber, 18 cents," is the average production cost of crude rubber. The New York market price is practically the same as the London price plus carrying charges to New York. This New York market, or spot-rubber price, is indicated on the chart and so marked. Deliberations resulting in the Stevenson plan commenced to bear fruit late in the summer of 1922. Note that the New York market price commenced to be affected. It gradually mounts until it is about 25 cents per pound on November 1, when the plan is put into effect.

It continues to mount until it reaches about 36 cents per pound in January of 1923. Then it slumps until the middle of 1924. Why? That is likewise shown on the chart. When the plan was put into effect there was a tremendous surplus of crude rubber. This surplus had to be sold. It declined from 56,816 tons to 4,740 tons in a period of one year. When this surplus was reduced crude-rubber buyers in this country became panicky. This resulted in highly competitive buying in this country, thereby forcing the New York market price in July of 1925 to the peak price of $1.21 per pound. The scared buyers, of course, produced this situation. Then it dropped, but still remained over 70 cents per pound. It then commenced to climb again and in three or four months was $1.11 per pound. The situation was truly alarming.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman contend that that peak was produced entirely by the Stevenson plan?

Mr. NEWTON. No; the gentleman does not claim that it was produced entirely by reason of the operation of the Stevenson plan, because no man can claim that any one factor is the sole contributor of anything.

Mr. CELLER. And what did balloon tires have to do with it?

Mr. NEWTON. Then came several efforts on the part of our Government. In the meantime the Department of Commerce had been making the investigation to which I referred earlier in my remarks. The market price commenced to go down until in the middle of 1926 it was down to about 42 cents per pound. With varying fluctuations it remained between 36 cents and 42 cents per pound until the end of the year 1927 when it commenced to slump to below 30 cents per pound.

Mr. Chairman, now I want to call attention to another curve here showing the import value per pound. The curve commences in January, 1925, when the price on crude rubber on the New York market was about 35 cents per pound. This curve represents the price paid for rubber that was purchased on contract and not upon the New York rubber market. It represents the value of the crude rubber imports. This means the price that the American rubber importers had to pay and which was disclosed as the commodity went through the customhouse. The New York price curve shows the price that buyers in that market had to pay.

The import value curve shows what was actually paid on the crude rubber coming into this country. It does not show so much speculation as the New York market price curve. It will be observed, however, that early in the year 1926 the average monthly import value per pound on our crude-rubber imports reached 80 cents per pound. Then it commenced to go down. Of course, contracts for crude rubber are made some five or six months in advance of requirements; hence, this curve commenced to recede after the New York price had already receded. It will further be observed that from the middle of the year 1926 up to the present time that it has been above 36 cents per pound almost all of the time, and is below it but a very few months thereof.

Now, I want to call your attention to Chart No. 2. This chart takes in the period of May, 1925, to July, 1927. The base line is 36 cents, which is the maximum fair price of crude rubber and which yields a handsome profit. Looking at the chart, you will observe that every month during that period the price was above 36 cents per pound; that is, the American rubber user who imports his crude rubber for tires or other purposes paid in excess of 36 cents per pound every one of those months. In two or three months it was very slight. One month it reached 38.3 cents per pound above 36 cents. Another month it was 36½ cents per pound above. You will note that during the entire period of slightly over two years that the total import cost to the American rubber dealer of his crude rubber in excess of 36 cents per pound amounted to $297,000,000. Of course, after this crude rubber had been manufactured into tires the percentage of additional cost to the American consumer was very substantially above that. We all know how tire prices mounted during that period. Tire prices in January, 1925, were lower than ever before in the history of the industry. They finally mounted in price until at the end of 1925 they had advanced 56 per cent.

The following table shows wholesale tire prices effective in January, 1925, and the dates, amount, and average percentage increase resulting from subsequent changes. Tire prices in January, 1925, were lower than ever before in the history of the industry, but present prices are only 90 per cent of the January, 1925, prices.

In preparing the following table quotations for a standard make of tire were used, and for the four following common sizes only: 30 by 3½ clincher cord, 32 by 4 straight-side cord, 32 by 4½ straight-side cord, and 29 by 4.40 balloon tires, these sizes being taken as fairly representative:

I am submitting herewith a table covering the five restriction years, November 1, 1922, to November 1, 1927. It shows the average percentage of rubber produced which was exportable under the plan, the standard or basic production, the exports that were permitted, the actual exports, and the loss to the rubber consumers throughout the world. This latter is the difference between standard production and actual exports. During that five-year period it shows a loss of over 500,000 tons of crude rubber, or about one-third of the standard production. Think of the effect upon the price if this rubber had been permitted to be exported.

the factors causing that sharp slump in the course of a very few months? Unquestionably a number of factors entered into that. I shall mention several. There was the competition from the Dutch East Indies, who were not subject to the Stevenson Act. There was the campaign under the direction of Secretary Hoover with the cooperation of the trade for conservation of rubber, and there was the increased use of substitutes; and there was the general investigation, first by the Department of Commerce followed by the congressional investigation, and the recommendations made which, in part at least, met with cooperation upon the part of the trade. Last, but in no sense least, can be mentioned the getting together of American rubber buyers for the purpose of forming a sort of national crude rubber reserve for the purpose of more effectively meeting the selling tactics of this foreign monopoly.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield for a couple of questions?

Mr. NEWTON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not he observed in the morning papers that Premier Baldwin had announced that they would abandon the Stevenson plan on the 1st of November?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes. I did see it. I am pleased to see that they are making progress in that country.

Mr. KING. I want to say that I was here when the Webb-Pomerene bill was passed, and I would like to ask the gentleman as a result of that legislation what benefit has come to the ordinary people of the country—what have they gotten out of it?

Mr. NEWTON. The workmen who have worked in the factories manufacturing the different commodities which have been exported abroad have received substantial benefits. During the year 1926 $200,000,000 worth of products were exported by these export trade associations. There must be out of a $200,000,000 business a substantial benefit flowing to the American workmen and the American business man. That likewise applies to the producers of farm products. I have figures showing that $35,000,000 of farm products were included in that year. That is not a very great amount in and of itself, but it is quite an item and is of practical benefit to the industry.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. Does the gentleman want the House to infer because of the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] as to what he saw in the morning paper that the Stevenson plan was to be abandoned by the 1st of November, rendering unnecessary this proposed legislation?

Mr. NEWTON. Not at all. I merely observed that I was glad to know that they were making some progress in economics. Some of their own people said when it was put into effect in 1922 that it was economically wrong and opposed it. Their views were not followed. That fight has been kept up there. We have assisted somewhat in our fight here and as a result the British Premier has announced—not that the control is off now—but has announced that if he does not change his mind in the future that it will go off on the 1st of November. However, no one knows who is going to be premier next fall. So that does not avoid the necessity of legislation as to rubber. Furthermore, the action of the British Government, even if carried into effect, would not affect other commodities like sisal and potash. Now, if control is really abandoned there will be no occasion for the forming of any purchasing agency or rubber reserve. But we do not know even if it is abandoned when it will be again renewed.

We ought to have on the statute books the means which the American consumer, the American manufacturer, and the American farmer can at any time use in order to prevent being gouged by unjustly high prices through foreign control.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. I will.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman has made an illuminating report as to crude rubber and coffee and has said that measures not know whether the control is going to be taken off then or not. They have a right to change their mind.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has it occurred to my colleague that Premier Baldwin might have made this statement hoping to defer this legislation? He knows that Congress is going to adjourn in six weeks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He does not even know that Congress is in session. [Laughter.]

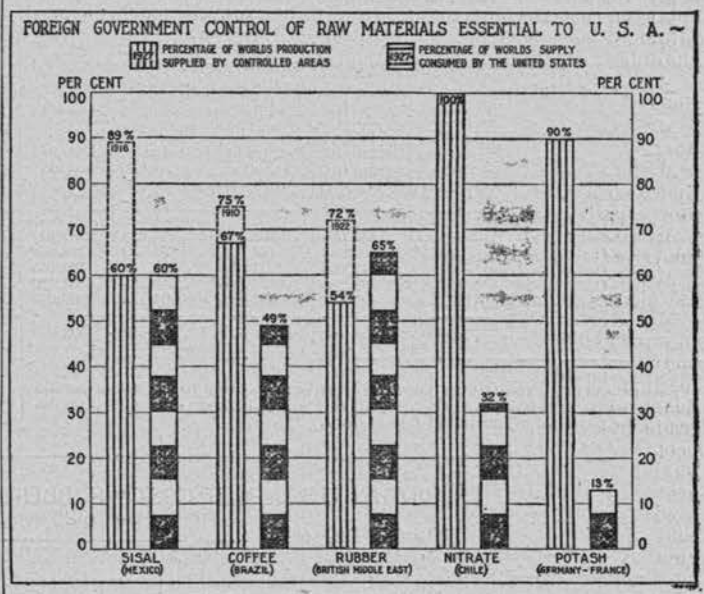

CHART No. 3

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. I assume the gentleman from Minnesota is aware of the fact that for 12 months and more the Stevenson plan has not been functioning and can not function efficiently because of the failure of the Netherlands Government, which now controls 33 per cent of the plantation rubber in the Middle East, to enter into the plan with the British Government. Is of this sort, pools, might cause international ill will. Would not the effect of this legislation, if adopted by Congress, be that England will reinstate that cartel or pool control? Will we not have that situation?

Mr. NEWTON. I hope the gentleman will not take up much of my time.

Mr. CELLER. The question involves a little time. In so far as we get this advantage, may not they put it on again?

Mr. NEWTON. If the gentleman will come to me next November we will find out if we have an "advantage." I do not that the reason why the plan failed to function, and is not that the reason why ultimately and inevitably the Stevenson plan must be abandoned? Is it not true that they can not control a sufficient amount?

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman ought not to take up my time in making a speech.

Mr. LOZIER. Is not that true?

Mr. NEWTON. No; it is not true. The gentleman is wrong in his conclusions. The Stevenson plan has been in operation during the past year.

Mr. LOZIER. Has it functioned?

Mr. NEWTON. Their plan of control has been in effect.

Mr. LOZIER. But has it not failed to function because the Dutch growers control 33 per cent?

Mr. NEWTON. The Dutch production has been a factor, of course. I can not yield further.

Mr. DOMINICK. Will the gentleman yield before he leaves this chart and give us the price of crude rubber to-day?

Mr. NEWTON. I stated it a moment ago. Spot is 21 cents.

Mr. DOMINICK. After the drop of yesterday?

Mr. NEWTON. It was about 21 yesterday, but it has been running down just below 30 cents for some time.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes; for a brief question, because I must hurry.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Is there not, however, a violation of the Sherman antitrust law by virtue of the pool which is now sought to be legalized?

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman is anticipating my remarks, and I prefer not to go into that now.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The gentleman will answer the question as to whether a pool is now operating and operating illegally?

Mr. NEWTON. So long as the gentleman has brought up the question at this time, I will say to the gentleman that nobody knows whether or not it is illegal to-day for manufacturers to combine to buy essential raw products abroad. The courts have not passed on the question. In an effort not to restrain trade but in an effort really to promote trade some of these people who are users of these products have combined their buying power. This has been in effect something like a year or so to a limited extent; but whenever they have gone to lawyers and asked for advice, these lawyers have told them that they do not know whether this is in violation of law. In view of the penalties of the Sherman Act, no responsible business man cares to run that sort of chance. This is a matter of policy, of course, to be determined by Congress.

Let me say right here, as long as this question has been brought up now, that since 1890 our policy has been to protect our people against the exactions of monopolies established in this country. We can reach monopolies in this country. We can not reach out across the seas in any effective legislative way and reach the monopolies over there through prohibitions or penalties. Furthermore, we must have these products. If there is an obligation upon government to protect its people from the exactions of monopolies here in this country, certainly there exists a similar obligation upon the Government to endeavor in every possible way to protect its citizens against unfair exactions from monopolies that may be abroad and beyond the jurisdiction of our own laws.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. In view of the situation that exists across the seas, are not American buyers justified in forming pools?

Mr. NEWTON. We should permit something of the kind to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I must not spend all of my time upon one commodity, for, as I have indicated, we are paying tribute to these foreign controls on about 15 or 16 essential commodities. I want to again refer to chart No. 3. The commodities set forth are sisal, coffee, rubber, nitrates, and potash. Note that Mexico produces to-day 60 per cent of the world's production of sisal and that we consume 60 per cent of the world's supply. Note also by the dotted line that in 1916 Mexico then produced 89 per cent of the world's sisal. She has been losing out under her system of control. It will be observed that Brazil now produces 67 per cent of the world's production of coffee. You will note by the dotted line that in 1910 Brazil produced 75 per cent of the world's production. The Brazilian valorization scheme controlling both production and exportation of coffee went into effect in 1910. One of the effects or consequences of governmental control has been to reduce Brazil's percentage of the world's production from 75 to 67 per cent.

Note that the United States consumes 49 per cent of the entire world's supply of coffee. Brazil only consumes 5 per cent of what the world produces. Of the coffee imported to this country, about 55 per cent comes from Brazil.

Further referring to Chart 3, it will be observed that Chile produces practically all the natural nitrates that are produced in the world. The United States consumes 32 per cent of this production at the present time. Chile consumes practically none at all. About 50 per cent of the natural nitrates which we import are used for fertilizer; the rest are used for chemicals, explosives, and so forth.

SISAL

Sisal is a vegetable fiber coming from the Province of Yucatan, in Mexico. It is used almost exclusively for binder twine. Mexico now produces 60 per cent of the world's sisal. The average production for the past three years has been about 610,000 bales of 400 pounds each. The United States consumes from 80 to 90 per cent of the annual sisal production of Mexico. In 1926 our imports from Mexico were 82,699 tons. The import value was $14,264,162. This represented 70 per cent of our total sisal imports for that year. Mexico uses very little of the sisal production; it ranges around 2 per cent of the crop.

Governmental control of sisal commenced in Mexico about 1915. The control organization consists of a so-called cooperative society of eight members who represent the Federal and State Governments of Mexico and the growers of the fiber. This cooperative organization has entire control of the marketing of crops and the fixing of price of sisal. It exercises direct control over the production. The control in the past has restricted production by refusal to purchase the fiber from the planter. At other times they have done so by quoting prices to the producers which will not permit of a fair profit.

A fair price for sisal is 5 cents per pound. That price will yield a very good profit to the producer. During the year 1913 the average price of sisal in New York was less than 5 cents per pound. The control was put into effect shortly thereafter. The effect of this control is shown by Chart 4, which sets forth the monthly average wholesale price per pound of Mexican sisal. The curve commences January 1, 1913, with sisal fiber at 4 cents per pound; it thereupon fluctuates between 4 and 5½ cents until about January 1, 1915, when it jumps and immediately recedes until the latter part of 1915 when this cooperative control organization was instituted. Note that they established an American sales agency. Immediately following the establishment of this governmental control the price of sisal fiber mounted by leaps and bounds from 6 cents per pound, 1 cent per pound above a fair price, until 1917–18 it had reached 19 cents per pound. Note that in the meantime the sales agency in this country which had been established by the foreign combine had been attacked by the Department of Justice. Before that case had been disposed of the war had ended and prices slumped from 19 cents to 8 cents per pound. Apparently, there had been much speculation by this foreign combine, which resulted in bankruptcy and the forming of a new organization. During this period the price got down to 4 cents per pound. Note that thereupon a new organization of governmental control was formed and that it resulted in driving the price up to 9 cents per pound. It is now 7 cents per pound or 2 cents per pound over a fair price. As a result of the sisal combine the Mexican control of production and distribution of sisal fiber cost the American farmer in 1918 from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 over and above the fair price. It is now costing him about $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 annually in excess of a fair price.

POTASH

Again I call your attention to Chart 3 and the last commodity therein mentioned—potash. It will be observed that Germany and France produce 90 per cent of the world's production of potash. The United States consumes 13 per cent of the world's supply. The world's production for the year 1926 for pure potash was about 1,500,000 tons. France and Germany cooperating together have formed a monopolistic control, and while we only consume 13 per cent of the world's production of potash, 95 per cent of what we do consume is imported from this Franco-German control. Our import values of potash will run somewhat in excess of $1,000,000 per month. The American farmer has been paying tribute to this monopolistic control of potash for a period of 35 or 40 years, when it was first discovered in western Germany and its value as a fertilizer was first determined. The control by these two countries is absolute. All potash operators are compelled to join the syndicate. All matters of policy and details as to control are vested in the Minister of Economy. Attempts have been made from time to time by American purchasers to break the monopoly, but without success. Contracts made by American purchasers at prices under the syndicate prices were nullified by action of the German Government. The American purchaser of potash was helpless before this monopolistic control under governmental auspices.

Then came the World War. Some of these deposits were in Alsace. This Province then became a part of France. France and Germany then vied with one another in order to sell their potash to the American consumer. The price thereupon went down. Their rivalry immediately ceased, for an agreement was drawn up between French and German potash interests. The effect of it was to again put into operation monopolistic control of production and distribution of potash. As a result there has been a restoration of the exorbitant prices in effect preceding the war. Early in 1927 our Department of Justice brought an action for alleged conspiracy in restraint of trade against the Franco-German potash interests. My understanding is that some sort of a sales agency had been set up in this country. In any event, our Government tried to institute proceedings against this monopoly. The claim was set up that it was governmentally owned and controlled by two soverign Governments—France and Germany—therefore it was not subject to our antitrust laws. My understanding is that the evidence has been presented, the case has been concluded, but the court has not yet rendered its decision.

It will be observed that the executive branch of our Government has been active in every way that it possibly can in order to get at these foreign monopolies. They have been handicapped because they have been instituted by sovereign governments, but the executive branch of our Government has at least tried to meet this situation. The legislative branch of the Government should follow the example. The situation will be met if legislation outlined in this bill before us is enacted into law.

It may be feared by some that the rights and privileges herein granted may be abused through the enhancing of prices, the suppressing of competition, or discriminatory practices. Similar fears were entertained by some Members of Congress when the Webb-Pomerene Export Trade Act was under consideration on the floor of this House. The fears then expressed by the opponents of that legislation have been proven not to be well founded. That will likewise be the case if this bill becomes a law. The moment one of these associations enters into any agreement enhancing prices, substantially lessening competition, or resorts to discriminatory practices, that very moment that association and its members become amenable to the antitrust laws.

If it is the duty of our Government to protect its citizens from exorbitant prices and other exactions of domestic monopolies, it is likewise its duty to at least permit its own citizens to so associate themselves together as to prevent foreign monopolies from doing the same thing. That is what this bill does. That is its purpose. That is the extent to which it can be used.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NEWTON. May I have just one more minute.

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. NEWTON. This is a fascinating subject. If I had had more time I would have been glad to yield to further interruptions. I want also to express my appreciation of the work that the Committee on the Judiciary and its distinguished acting chairman [Mr. DYER] have done upon this measure. And, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I again say this bill is so safeguarded as to prevent its being used to enhance prices, discriminate among buyers, to store unreasonable stocks of the commodities mentioned, or to in any other way unduly lessen competition or be in restraint of trade. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, an examination of the hearing before the Judiciary Committee discloses that the purpose of this bill is to authorize the formation and operation of a monopoly for the purchase of crude rubber. At least, apparently, that is the primary and controlling purpose. Potash and sisal are mentioned, but they are present in this bill as traveling companions to help rubber over the rough places in the journey. There is also the blanket provision embraced in the language "or other raw materials or products of nature."

Rubber was quoted yesterday at 21 cents per pound. The testimony before the committee fixed a price at around 36 cents per pound as a fair price. This bill is present here, therefore, at a time when rubber is around 15 cents per pound under a fair price. You read the significant item in the paper this morning as to the abandonment of the pool. This is a rather remarkable bill under all the circumstances or any circumstances.

To the extent that corporations are permitted to organize and carry on under the provisions of this bill they are exempted from the act of July, 1900, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraint and monopoly," and also from the provisions of the revenue act of 1894, as amended by the act of February, 1913. The character of associations defined in the bill are not only permitted to organize for the purposes specified, which would not be permitted under existing law, but other corporations are permitted to own the stock of the importing corporation. There is no doubt about the purpose to create a monopoly for a specific purpose, it is admitted. The Federal Trade Commission is given jurisdiction, and it is provided if such commission believes the law is being violated, it may summon the association under suspicion for investigation. If the commission finds the law is being violated, the offender is not prosecuted but is told how to carry on its business within the law. If it does not profit by good advice, the matter is turned over to the Attorney General.

This bill proposes to authorize the organization of a monopoly for a specific purpose. Now, gentlemen of the House, you can not and we can not profess to be ignorant of the fact that when a monopoly is created, when organizations for monopolistic purposes are permitted, legislation is powerless to limit the scope of the monopolistic activities. No man on the floor of this House can pretend not to know that. We can write limitations into law; but we can not prevent them, when they get together in their conferences, from determining and exercising a broader monopolistic power. That danger ought not to be incurred certainly where necessity does not exist.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman knows that we enacted the export provisions. How does that differ from this and from the principle of which the gentleman now speaks?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think there is a difference, but suppose there were no difference? Suppose we have gone a long way in the wrong direction. I do not say we have, but let us assume it. Does not that suggest to wise men that they should the more quickly turn about? Suppose I voted for that bill, what difference does it make? The only consistency worthy of any man's aspirations is that each time when he comes to act he have the will to advise himself with regard to what his duty is then under then existing circumstances and have the courage to do it.

Mr. MICHENER. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to commend to the gentleman his speech made on the floor of this House when the Webb-Pomerene Act was up—his speech in favor of the general principles of the bill. It was quite convincing to me.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Of course, if I spoke at all it was a good speech, but I do not want to quote it now.

Mr. BOWLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BOWLING. Was not the purpose of that legislation to prevent a monopoly while the purpose of this legislation is to create a monopoly?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

PRESENT LOW PRICE OF RUBBER

The alleged justification for this proposed legislation is that rubber is produced and sold under monopolistic conditions. But as stated, the bill comes before this body for approval at a time when the price of crude rubber is 15 cents per pound below what the advocates of this bill agree is a fair price, and the movement which resulted in excessive prices seems to have broken under the weight of the condition which those prices created. It must be agreed that this bill violates our general domestic policy with regard to monopolies. It establishes a dangerous precedent in international commerce. No Members of Congress coming from sections of the country which produce exportable surpluses can fail to appreciate the possible consequences of the following abroad of the precedent which this bill would establish.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Of course, that is the existing law with reference to the Webb Act.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not care whether it is existing law or not. We are considering this law, and if it is not right it is not right, and a bad precedent does not justify another bad precedent.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not just now. I will yield in a moment.

DANGER TO COTTON DISTRICTS OF SUCH A PRECEDENT

Now, gentlemen, in my judgment, if we embark upon this policy of government, we are going to have to meet it. There is no justification for it. With rubber 21 cents a pound, what are we doing it for? In the name of common sense, what are we doing it for? You men from the cotton districts; you men from the grain districts; you men from the wheat districts; you men who live in territories producing exportable surpluses—what in the name of common sense are we establishing this sort of precedent in international commerce for?

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will yield in a minute.

In what situation will the Government of the United States be if the nations abroad combine to buy American wheat or American meat or American cotton? Will we be in a position to go to the State Department and ask it to make representations of protest to the European countries engaging in this trust or monopoly for the purpose of purchasing? What shape will we be in when we protest against action with regard to which we have set the first precedent? You want to think about that, gentlemen. I can not understand this insistence upon this bill in the present situation.

I can understand the reason gentlemen might have had for advocating legislation of this sort when the price was at its peak; but when we see, as a matter of fact, not of theory, that this artificial price of which gentlemen complain has broken down under the weight of the conditions which it has created, with the reason for the legislation gone, I can not see how we as intelligent people, with our constituents producing vast exportable surpluses and interested in maintaining competitive purchasing conditions in the world, will come here and establish a precedent of organization to buy. I can not get it—I do not understand it.

At first I had some inclination to support this bill, having in mind the background of this experience, but the more I looked into it the more dangerous I appreciated the precedent would be. The more I looked into it the more I discovered the lack of necessity or justification for this legislation.

I now yield to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman speaks altogether of rubber and of the legislation as affecting rubber users. The gentleman, I am sure, will recall the testimony of Mr. Lewis J. Taber, national master of the National Grange——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; I overlooked that.

Mr. DYER (continuing). Who claimed before the committee that he represented over 800,000 people, and here is a part of his language before the committee:

> The farmers are more interested in this legislation than any other group in the Nation.

WHERE REPRESENTATIVE RESPONSIBILITY LIES

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I forgot that, and I want to thank the gentleman; but I want to say this: I am the Representative responsible on the floor of this House for the governmental policy affecting the farmers of my country and I am representing them now better, I think, than Mr. Taber represented them before the Judiciary Committee of the House. [Applause.] I do not question his motives, but when Mr. Taber, representing people producing grain and meat and those commodities where it is of first importance that free, open, competitive conditions exist in the markets of the world, comes here and wants to establish a precedent as an aid to rubber, a precedent that he will have to face and that his Government will have to face, if we establish it, what can we say——

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Is it not probable that the National Grange leader was thinking more of potash and sisal than he was of rubber when he presented his testimony?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He talked chiefly about rubber.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. He knew less about them, probably. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think, with all respect, that at that particular moment he was just talking, not thinking. [Laughter.] He was not thinking deeper than the surface of the situation. He did not see the possibilities which must arise in the commerce of the world when his men knock at the door of the world for the opportunity of free, competitive bidding for their products.

I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I was wondering about Mr. Taber appearing in his representative capacity for 800,000 farmers and was wondering if this is the relief he is going to give the 800,000 farmers he says he represents.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman also recalls that the American Farm Bureau Federation, who gave considerable study to this matter, did not appear by personal representative but filed a written argument in favor of the legislation in behalf of the farmers, which argument is included in the printed hearings.

Mr. DYER. Also the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Well, I will admit everybody appeared then. I do not mean to be discourteous——

Mr. MICHENER. Just one other thought in that connection. Is it not true that when the Secretary of Commerce was before the committee advocating this particular legislation, he said the enactment of this law would not of itself put into effect the pool or combination and that it was his judgment that with legislation of this kind on the statute books the conduct of the English in reference to rubber might be such it would never be necessary to put into force this very piece of legislation.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Now let me submit this to the judgment of the House. Assuming that the position of the Secretary of Commerce was correct, that it would not be necessary to put it into operation, when we confront a situation where the legislation clearly is not necessary in order to bring the relief then desired, does not the same common sense which actuated the Secretary of Commerce in his suggestion then warn us against this unnecessary procedure?

Mr. STOBBS and Mr. RAMSEYER rose.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the committee.

Mr. STOBBS. The gentleman says the legislation is not necessary; is it not the fact that rubber was selling at $1.21 a pound until the association was formed, illegally, we will say, and that stabilized the price of rubber so that it went from $1.21 down to forty-odd cents a pound and only varied throughout the whole year of 1927 9 cents a pound. Is not that true?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; that is not true. I think this is true; I think when they put the price of rubber so high they stimulated production to the point where the market broke under the weight of accumulated production. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Speaking of setting a precedent, will the gentleman tell us about the existence of buying pools in foreign countries?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I know of no buying pools internationally.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Not international pools, but buying pools in foreign countries. This would not be an international pool. What does the gentleman know about the existence of any buying pools in other countries?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not know anything about it; I imagine there are some, but none sufficiently comprehensive to affect the price of American commodities. [Applause.]

The Congress should stop in this matter where it is, reserving to itself, of course, its future action dependent upon future developments. This bill reaches very deeply.

MONOPOLY OFFENDS BASIC POLICIES

Aside from the international trade aspects there are certain basic policies which have come to be recognized as essential to the operation of our kind of government against which the bill offends. Among them are that the individual may do whatever is not prohibited by the regularly enacted law of the land, and whatever is prohibited he may not do. The effect of this bill would be to change that and send the individual not to the public statutes but to the Secretary of Commerce as the permissive or prohibitive power of the land. In so far as it goes, it is a substitution of personal government for institutional government. On the other hand, if there should in fact not be a selling monopoly abroad the law enforcement officers of the Government could not proceed against a monopoly organized under this bill if the person in office, the Secretary of Commerce, had issued the certificate, regardless of the facts. It is the certificate of the Secretary of Commerce or its absence which is to determine private rights and public powers.

This power and the method of its exercise is strikingly similar to that which kings formerly exercised through what was known as orders in council. History establishes that it is the nature of such a power to lead to the most extraordinary abuse. When the people through the House of Commons made an end of such government they achieved what students of government agree was a victory of first magnitude in the development of what we call democratic or free government, where the people are governed by laws publicly enacted by duly constituted legislative agencies, and which are construed and applied according to fixed forms and rules of procedure by a duly constituted judiciary. This bill advances bureaucracy one more step toward its absorption of governmental power. It has also been our policy to oppose monopolies.

It is contended that modern conditions require an abandonment of this policy. When we do, we abandon our plan of government. Let us not deceive ourselves. Our sort of government can not be adjusted to a condition of monopolistic control. It is not possible to preserve democracy in government if democracy in business opportunity is destroyed by monopoly. We take our choice. If we do become monopoly controlled in industry, business, finance, and in other respects there can be but one or two results. There will develop either a sort of business socialism through the distribution of shares of stock in those monopolies, or business feudalism, great business overlords to which others owe business allegiance and business loyalty, or a development having the characteristics of both. In either event, government will take on the characteristics of that control. It is inevitable. That is what is taking place now. Chain stores, chain theaters, chain banks, power control, chain newspapers, monopoly developing everywhere, consolidation going on everywhere.

CROWDING OUT THE LITTLE MAN

These are crowding out the little man, the yeoman of trade and industry, the cottager of the small establishment where independence of business gives that independence of spirit without which free institutions can not exist and where final responsibility and self-guided effort make for the development of those elements of manhood and of character which alone can keep vital the constitution of a self-governing people. Those who are pressing this movement are not true friends to their own interest. They are getting the country ready for a great swing back. There is no justification for the notion that the people are going to surrender the liberty of opportunity or the present form of government. Its constitution is too deeply rooted in the governmental concepts of the people.

THE PENDULUM WILL SWING BACK

The thing which is happening now has not infrequently occurred during the almost two thousand years of the history of our system. It is the phenomenon of the swinging of the pendulum. The pendulum is going the other way now. The Bible speaks of people who have ears to hear but hear not, and eyes to see but see not. Men in great position in government, captains of industry, they have ears but hear not the warnings of history, they have eyes but they see not the danger when the swing back comes. They heed not the law of nature which every country boy can see manifesting itself through the old grapevine swing, and which students of nature know is a law universal, operating everywhere. King John went far, and when the swing back came it rested at Runnymede. From Charles and his predecessors came the Petition of Right; from James II, the Bill of Rights; from William, the Act of Settlement; and from George III and his Parliament came the Declaration of Independence. Louis XIV and his successors swung the pendulum far, and it swung back into the blood of the French Revolution. From the Czars of Russia and their advisers bolshevism came. The incompetence and excesses of the socialists of Italy are responsible for Mussolini.

Just now there is no protest against monopolistic development and no caution on the part of those engaged in such development—none whatever. It is remarkable. I have no prejudice. I have no envy of the vastly rich. There is no danger from the reds. They can originate nothing. Private fortunes can be imperiled in this country only by those who possess them. This Government can not be put in danger by the soap-box agitator. It is only from within that it can be destroyed. Queer notions are in the heads of the people. Less than six months ago the publisher of a great periodical said to me he wished we had a Mussolini for about 10 years in this country. We are moving fast toward the crisis. Nobody can forejudge it. There may come upon the scene some outstanding figure who in the midst of chaos shall seize power from incompetent hands. I do not believe it. I believe we will come through the crisis, whatever it may be, and adjust ourselves through ordinary and orderly processes. There has never been a Mussolini or even a Napoleon in Anglo-Saxon history. There was a Cromwell, however. This bill is not in itself of sufficient importance to justify what is said, but it points the way in which we are moving. Its presence here is a fit occasion for us to pause and consider our present road and its destination. The time has come when in the spirit of patriotic purpose, while we can be calm and deliberate and without prejudice, we should stop, locate our position, look again at the star of our destiny, and read the compass. In the early constitutional conventions, beginning with the Virginia convention to which men came with that yearning for liberty which only tyranny can give, and with that profound wisdom which comes only from deep meditation, they declared a great truth in these words:

Frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty.

NATURE'S LAWS MUST BE RESPECTED

Nations are not accidents. They have been provided for in the big economy. They are living things; the laws of their nature must be respected by statesmen just as the physician, the farmer, the builder, and all others must respect the laws of nature governing that with regard to which they have to do. Monopolies, the destruction of democracy in business opportunity, the destruction of independence of spirit which comes from independence of position, is against the nature of our sort of government. No change in conditions can change this. It is fixed in the nature of things.

These are fundamental things. This bill offends against them at too many points to warrant legislative sanction. Let us enumerate them. It provides for the creation of a monopoly. It substitutes personal for institutional government. It sends the individual to an administrative official for permission to act within the scope of a legislatively declared public policy. It makes it possible for the arbitrary—not reviewable—act of a person to cut off the law-enforcement officials from the enforcement of those basic public policies which have been legislatively fixed. It increases bureaucracy. It endangers us to similar retaliatory measures to which danger there is no justifiable excuse for our exposing ourselves.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WELLER].

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I find myself with reference to this bill ready to support it and yet leaning very deferentially to the gentleman as a lawyer and leader of my party in the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Texas. I always like to follow the leadership of the gentleman from Texas on questions of law, and I usually do, but I can not follow him on this occasion.

The charge is made that this bill is made to enact a monopoly, or, in other words, to stimulate and create a monopoly. That is not the purpose of the bill. There is no monopoly at present in this country of any nature or kind or description of the three articles mentioned in this bill.

A very serious question has arisen, however, outside of this country where these three articles are produced, as to what shall actually constitute in these three countries the right of the American business man to go into those countries and receive fair play from the governmental control or governmental system. The Stevenson scheme is not approved exactly by Parliament or the legislative assembly, but is approved by the bureaucrats and those in charge of the colonial office.

When we take a particular product like rubber or sisal or any other raw material as this bill provides, which the Secretary of Commerce may on the presentation of evidence have cause to believe is a material requiring concentration of purchase as here in rubber we are met by a monstrous bureaucracy that extends all the way from London to the British East Indies.

London decreed that there should be a restriction of planting and production of rubber trees; that the acreage should be concentrated and limited, so that the British dealers in London could hold up, if you please, the American market.

The East Indies produced about 70 per cent of the entire rubber of the world, and 75 per cent of the rubber of the world, approximately, is used by American manufacturers, so that practically all the rubber produced by East Indies by the planters or farmers comes to this country. Now, the vital necessity of this legislation is indicated, as it is in the hearings, that over $900,000,000 of rubber each year is consumed in automobile tires and accessories, rubbers, and overcoats in the United States—over $900,000,000 each year within the borders of the United States. So that if there be a fluctuation of 1 cent a pound in the price of rubber it means $9,000,000 to the American public.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will yield, rubber went down 12 cents a pound.

Mr. WELLER. I will come to that. Here we have what is known as the Stevenson restriction plan, which has permitted in the past three years the state of business that I have suggested, where the difference of 1 cent a pound makes a difference of $9,000,000 to the American people. Instead of calling this a restriction plan of Sir James Stevenson it should be called a robber plan, because it tends directly to affect and rob the American people.

The same system of organization of the bureaucracy of limiting rubber exists in Yucatan and Mexico in reference to sisal and exists in Germany with reference to potash.

So we have three bureaucratic commodities restricted by foreign governments brought to this country which are of vital necessity.

The question so aroused the general community in making the price that England through her Prime Minister has announced that they expect to abrogate this robber rubber plan on the 1st of next November.

What is the necessity for this legislation? The necessity is simply this, that it takes, first, seven years to grow a rubber tree, and, secondly, there is no other place in the world where we can, with practicability, produce rubber except in the East Indies. Surely, we have enough rubber now if we have 100 per cent production in the British East Indies to supply the rubber market of the world, and at a low price. If, perchance, there should be a change of prime minister, and there may be, we would probably go right back and the rubber market of the world would be controlled by England again, and the price of rubber would shoot right up, maybe to $1.20 a pound again, and the American public would be paying the freight.

What is this so-called Stevenson plan? The Stevenson plan applied only directly to two of the colonies of Great Britain, Ceylon and British Malaya. The other two, Burma and Borneo, possession of England, just follow along, as it were, played along and adopted through their legislative assemblies the same program. In the years that we have been using rubber we find that practically all of the rubber has been what is known as jungle rubber, growing out in the woods, requiring no cultivation. Until 1905 there was no necessity to cultivate rubber, because it grew right out in the jungle, but as the necessity in the automobile construction and other phases of business activities continued then it became necessary to actually cultivate rubber. We find that the cultivation of rubber ran from 174 tons in 1905 to 286,000 tons in 1924, 565,000 tons in 1927. This plantation rubber, under British restriction, grew to be a monstrous industry, but in that industry never at any time did the men of the Dutch East Indies, the far-seeing Dutch merchants, participate in any way directly or indirectly with the rubber industry of England. The result was that England was putting a law, through her Colonial Secretary, on the books of the legislative assemblies of outlying possessions, which was being followed and had to be followed by her subjects, but not by the Dutch, restricting the production of the acreage on the one hand for English possessions, while the Dutchman on an island within 100 miles and within the rubber areas, was not bound by the English restriction at all. England, if you please, was holding the bag for the Dutch East India merchants, and they waxed fat and grew rich. The Dutch East Indies did not produce rubber until 1911, and in 1922, when the British restriction act first went into effect the British produced 271,000 tons, and the Netherlands produced 102,000 tons, while in 1927 the British produced 322,908 tons and the Dutch 227,893 tons. In 1928 the ratio will run along about the same. The Dutchmen were and are planting about 100 per cent production to the acre.

The mere fact that the Stevenson plan is eliminated, possibly as of November 1 next, which may or may not be followed, does not guarantee and offers no protection whatever to the American business man and the American dealer unless he be permitted to combine with his fellows and bargain collectively in the open market at a price that is fair and agreeable.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELLER. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I understand, therefore, that the operation of the Stevenson plan had the effect of bringing out the Dutch East India rubber; that is, it had the effect of increasing the supply. Did not that have the effect of reducing the price of rubber?

Mr. WELLER. No; because the Dutchmen of the East Indies do not necessarily go through the markets of London, and are not controlled in their prices through the markets of London; they sell directly to the United States. The Dutchmen have produced at less expense a greater acreage, and they have produced what is equivalent of 100 per cent production, whereas the Englishmen have produced only to the extent of 50 per cent of the acreage.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD the various prices of rubber from 1921 down?

Mr. WELLER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman explain to us why the price has gone down so?

Mr. WELLER. The price has gone down simply because of the shrewd business buying of men in this country, and by virtue of "fighting fire with fire" they have been forced to use their brains and wit and ingenuity in order to buy at the proper time, and it may be that they have had to hold their stocks in warehouses or on spot deliveries or future deliveries. It has been judicious buying that has protected the American business man.

Mr. STEVENSON. And is not the best way to manage business to let these business men manage it and not have the Government interfere?

Mr. WELLER. I quite agree with the gentleman that the business men ought to be permitted to manage their own business, but when they are trying to do that and we have a law on the statute books which would possibly subject them to penalty and forfeiture when they are not intentionally violating any law, we should legalize their acts in order that they may act for and in behalf of their own business.

Mr. MICHENER. Does not the gentleman think that the fact that this rubber pool, so to speak, operated by business men, has not acted in any way in restraint of trade, in so doing has brought about the condition that we find to-day so far as the price of rubber is concerned?

Mr. WELLER. I think that is true. I think that is a fair statement. That business has been conducted by men who have been actually forced to the wall and compelled, as I said before, to fight fire with fire. If we find now that by their combination with reference to prices in foreign countries they are violating the law of this country, then we are placing a serious handicap upon the business of our country if we do not correct that situation. Now, we have provided here under the terms of this bill an elastic proposition.

Under the terms of this bill if the Secretary of Commerce finds, upon a proper showing, that the industry is affected—the Webb-Pomerene law then might possibly affect these men and subject them to a penalty or a forfeit—under the terms of this bill they would be permitted upon the proper presentation, under Government regulation, to continue business, and if they violated, as the gentleman suggested, the terms of the Webb-Pomerene Act, then they would not be subject to criminal prosecution.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELLER. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. Appropos of your suggestion that the Dutch marketed their rubber not through London but through America and other ports of the world, is it not true that in the year 1922 our imports from the Dutch East Indies were 92,000,000 pounds, and in 1926, 156,000,000?

Mr. WELLER. They speak of it in tons.

Mr. LOZIER. The Dutch have practically doubled their imports into the United States since the Stevenson Act went through.

Mr. WELLER. That is true, and they have crept up on the British almost 60 per cent in one year.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELLER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. That has been since the American purchasing power has united?

Mr. WELLER. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELLER. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Is not one purpose of this bill to legalize the existing rubber pool or combination?

Mr. WELLER. That is not the purpose of it. However, you are stating it as many others would state it. These men, as I said, are fighting fire with fire, and in so doing they are coming under the criminal provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act or the Webb-Pomerene Act.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. They are not doing anything as to which their right might be questioned?

Mr. WELLER. That is correct, but it may be.

RUBBER

Rubber is financially the greatest and most important product we now have to deal with, but in no other case is there so clear a division between the producer and consumer along national lines. Rubber has a close rival in Brazilian coffee, but after all British rubber stands preeminently above all import products.

Prior to 1920 crude rubber sold in the United States at a price between 20 and 30 cents per pound, and practically all of the crude rubber was jungle grown, there being practically little or no cultivated rubber.

During the war great quantities of rubber were acquired by the United States and when the war ceased this great supply and overproduction was placed upon our doorstep by the British Government.

In 1905 the total amount of plantation rubber was about 174 tons, while the total wild, tropical, and jungle production was 59,320 tons. As rubber began to be cultivated it was found that Sumatra and Java and the British possessions of Malaya and British islands were the most fertile, and experimentation disclosed that rubber could best be produced within 10° of either side of the Equator. In the year 1920 the total plantation of rubber had increased from 174 tons to 304,671 tons, while tropical, wild, and jungle production fell off from 59,320 tons to 36,464 tons, and it is fair to say that this ratio for all practical purposes could be continued.

In 1922, however, the British Government saw that there was destined to be a large production of the supply of rubber, which would tend to decrease its price, and that the supply would be so great that the demand for crude rubber would necessarily cause a depression of rubber prices. The British Government decided that instead of permitting the British possessions to produce all of the rubber that a plantation could cultivate that the cultivation of trees and harvesting of crops should be defined and restricted. Hence came the so-called "Stevenson scheme."

The British Parliament passed an act wherein the local government officials of the country were directed to administer the law, and a set standard was attempted to be fixed on the productions of all states of the particular territory or part thereof. Price levels were arbitrarily fixed by the terms of this act, with a fixed schedule based on London prices. The acreage and trees were subject to inspection and heavy penalties were set up for infractions or false disclosures, and the act provided that every estate under the British flag would be restricted by law to 60 per cent of its production.

The restriction act had the effect of reducing the output of the plantations to 60 per cent of the production, and this figure is based upon a term of eight months, so that the percentage of production will not be increased for several months to come.

This 60 per cent restriction will remain at this figure until rubber reaches the price of 42 cents a pound or more for a period of nine consecutive months from February 1, 1928. Should, however, the price of rubber reach 48 cents a pound for any three consecutive months, then the restriction provisions would be increased to 70 per cent of the output, and should the price of rubber remain at 75 per cent for three consecutive months the restriction figure would be lifted to 100 per cent. Following that, however, should the price of rubber fail to maintain the 42 cents for any consecutive period of three months, the restriction would be immediately restored.

At the period between November 1, 1919, and November 1, 1920, the basic price of rubber was fixed at 1 shilling 6 pence, or about 36 cents per pound, and it was provided that if the prices of rubber exceeded 30 cents a 5 per cent increase would be available every three months, so that 100 per cent production of the acreage was only available when the prices reached 75 cents. In other words, the production of a crude rubber plantation could only equal the harvest of the production of the year November 1, 1919, to November 1, 1920.

Year	British Empire output of plantation rubber	Selling value	Net profits	Approximate area in bearing	Approximate profit per acre
1909	4,318	$3,000,000	$2,150,000	40,000	53 15 0
1910	8,406	7,000,000	5,350,000	95,000	56 6 0
1911	14,456	7,200,000	4,350,000	150,000	29 0 0

The Stevenson committee estimated that the world's consumption of rubber for the ensuing years of 1923 would be approximately 330,000 tons, of which the British could produce 151,000 tons or 60 per cent of the total production of 262,000 tons, the Dutch could produce 64,000 tons, and all other countries 25,000. The world's output of plantation rubber was distributed among the producing countries in the following proportions:

	Per cent
Malaya	57.5
Ceylon	12.5
South India and Burma	2.0
Dutch East Indies	25.5
Other countries	2.5

At the time that the Stevenson Act took effect, rubber was selling in New York for about 20 cents per pound, London price, plus 3 cents per pound to get it here in New York tariff free. As soon as the act took effect, the price of 30 cents per pound being called the "fair price," the price in New York immediately jumped to 37 cents per pound and finally, as the act took effect, the prices shot up to 87 cents a pound and finally $1.20 a pound.

A simple illustration will disclose a tremendous cost to the American people, for more than 70 per cent of the rubber production of the world is under the control of the British Empire and the American people consume 75 per cent of this amount. In 1926 the American people spent $900,000,000 in buying rubber tires and automobile accessories of rubber so that the charge of 1 cent per pound on the price of rubber means a difference of $9,000,000 to the American people. A saving of 1 cent per pound to the American people, who are the largest dealers, operators, and users of automobiles in the world, means a tremendous saving and conservation of our wealth. The automobile not only as a pleasure car but on the farm and in business has come to stay and is a fixed method of transportation at least for several decades to come. The price of crude rubber as a result of the Stevenson plan shot up in a spectacular degree and at the expense primarily of the American public. We not only pay the freight but we pay for the upkeep, management, and harvesting of the British crops of crude rubber.

Shortly after January 1, 1928, current newspaper reports indicated that the British Parliament would abrogate and, in some way, terminate the Stevenson restriction plan. On April 4, 1928, Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin announced in public press the Stevenson scheme would be suspended on November 1, 1928.

The inequity of this plan is apparent, and the tremendous hardships that it has worked against the American people are disclosed, but if the ban is lifted at this time it will take several years at least before the American public can get any relief. Since 1922 not only the sales, but the trees, harvest, labor, machinery, everything has been based upon a 60 per cent production and in a measure the British Island has adjusted itself to this schedule.

It takes seven years to plant and cultivate a rubber tree before it begins to bear fruit. The danger has already been done and substantial relief can not be felt until the greater part of seven years has passed, and then we must assume favorable climatic and favorable soil conditions.

What the American people want now is relief as soon and as early as possible. The American people have protested against the Stevenson plan. The matter was discussed in the Congress of the United States on December 19, 1925, H. R. 59, page 1214, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-ninth Congress, and a resolution was adopted providing:

That the well-being of the American people was seriously threatened by the control of the supply of rubber resulting in the excessive prices wholly unjustified by the normal laws of supply and demand.

The following are tables taken from the congressional hearing before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee 1926:

This table shows that whereas, in 1905, 99.7 per cent of the rubber produced was wild rubber, during the last year given less than 7 per cent came from wild rubber sources. That shows clearly that the rubber of the world is now a matter of cultivation and plantation.

This table also shows the growth or total rubber production from 50,000 tons in 1905 to 414,000 tons, even under restriction, in 1924.

Now, the planted rubber industry is located in the Middle East, chiefly in British possessions, and I submit to the committee a table showing the location and production of the planted industry.

That table shows that the planted industry is producing today—produced in 1924, as I stated—about 93 per cent of the rubber. Of this plantation rubber approximately 70 per cent of the plantations are located within the British East Indies. The actual production during the last two or three years does not bear out that percentage of production because of the restriction in the British area and therefore the enlarged ratio of production in other areas.

The acreage involved in the industry and its distribution is shown in the following table:

Area planted and tappable[1], total Middle East

Countries	Total area planted[2]	Area tappable[3]

[1] Includes both European and native-owned rubber.
[2] To end of 1923.
[3] In 1924; 5 years old or over.

This table shows that at the present time the total area planted is about 4,200,000 acres and the amount in production is about 3,800,000 acres.

An investigation by the department at that time showed that the capital invested in the rubber plantations in the whole of the Middle East, which involves the Dutch and other possessions as well as the British, amounted to $876,000,000. That was not the capitalization of corporations, but was an estimate of the actual capital invested. The report further shows the cost of production. I will not take time to read that section of the report, but include it in the record at this point.

The report is as follows:

CAPITAL INVESTMENT

Following is an approximation of the capital invested in rubber plantations in the Middle East and its origin, stated in American currency:

Great Britain	$505,000,000

Japan	42,000,000

THE LEGAL PHASES OF IMPORT TRADE

The bill H. R. 8927 seeks to amend the export trade act known as the Webb-Pomerene Act so as to permit certain commodities of this country to make combinations for the purpose of buying certain raw materials under permit of the Secretary of Commerce. In other words the bill provides that the act shall be amended so that the provisions therein contained, relating to combinations for the purpose of export trade, may also applied in connection with import trade so that the export and import trade with respect to combinations and monopoly outside of the United States may be effectuated. In other words it is not illegal under the Webb-Pomerene Act to combine to procure prices or to fight monopoly abroad so long as the acts do not enhance prices within the United States nor discriminate in the sale of its commodities in the United States and do not effect a competition in the United States so that we may also protect American business which is compelled to buy commodities outside of the United States.

It is sought to provide in this bill that import trade which relates to crude rubber, potash, sisal, and other raw materials which are of a character not made, produced, or grown in the United States in sufficient quantities for the commercial needs of the United States.

Ample jurisdiction is given to the Secretary of Commerce in a proper case and when he has reasonable cause to believe that a monopoly exists outside the United States which requires collected and concerted action by American business and American consumers. The Secretary of Commerce is given the jurisdiction to make a finding that such monopoly exists if he has reasonable cause to believe from the evidence submitted to him that monopoly of production or prices exists to the detriment of the American business man. As an added security, the bill provides that if the Secretary of Commerce issues a permit for collective bargaining under the circumstances aforementioned, that such association shall be under his jurisdiction and control and that it will not be permitted to discriminate in certain commodities or to play with prices or accumulate unreasonable stocks of merchandise; and so, too, if the necessity for the permit ceases to exist and the monopoly abroad is dissipated and no longer exists, then the permit can be withdrawn.

In other words, the purpose of the bill is sought to give the same effect to import traders as are now had and enjoyed by export traders.

The act provides that the association for the purpose of combination can only be permitted by the Secretary of Commerce when the raw materials of products are not produced or grown in substantial quantities within the United States and are controlled by foreign-government combinations, thereby permitting a combination of American business men to act together and in concert for their protection for the purpose of importing such raw materials without the possibility of infringing upon the antitrust laws of the United States. It might be contended that without the aid of the proposed act that such a combination would violate the antitrust laws and subject the American business man to a violation of the laws of commerce, and such acts would make them liable to civil and criminal penalty.

SISAL

It is said that the plants, to form a plantation, should not be higher than 10 or 12 inches or even less.

Once a field is planted it may be practically left to itself, as there is probably no crop, except the castor-oil plant, which requires less care to bring it to perfection than sisal. At the same time a little care is needed at the outset until the plants are robust. No weeds should be allowed to grow and the suckers should be cut down. But the suckers are valuable for replanting purposes.

The length of the fiber is one important factor in its fitness for the market. The least length should be 2 feet 6 inches.

Once the plants have arrived at the cutting stage, no other labor is required in the field except the cutters and the carters. The cutting may be performed the year round.

About 80 per cent of the raw fiber used in the manufacture of binder twine in the United States is sisal and about 75 per cent of the world's production comes from Mexico.

Sisal, manila hemp, and New Zealand hemp mainly constitute what is called the hard-fiber group. They are to some extent interchangeable in use, but the superior quality of manila hemp renders it more suitable for rope making and the better qualities have always commanded a price premium for those purposes where greater tensile strength than that afforded by sisal fiber is required.

It takes seven years in Yucatan from the planting to the cropping of the plant, and the total output represents a half century of hard work. In the northern part of Yucatan they can not raise anything but hemp. It is the chief industry. Seven-eighths of the population are devoted to the cultivation of this plant. This is the Government's only source of revenue. Yucatan has about 315,000 inhabitants and is one of the states of Mexico. It comprises an area of 26,000 square miles.

About 1902 the International Harvester Co. was organized and headed by Mr. Molina, who retired from business and went into politics, and became Governor of Yucatan and afterwards secretary of public works. He has been succeeded by his son-in-law, Mr. Montes, who is said to be the agent of the International Harvester Co.

Yucatan produces about 1,000 pounds of hemp per acre. The plants live about 25 years.

A commission was created in 1908 which provided what the price of hemp should be under the guise of extending the manufacturing of hemp throughout the State. The commission was authorized by the Legislature of Yucatan, which passed a law creating the commission. It is a government commission appointed by the governor and the members are removable by the government.

Hemp or sisal is used principally for binder twine for oats, barley, wheat, and so forth.

On January 8, 1915, the Congress of the State of Yucatan passed the first legislation contemplating a control of the sisal product. Yucatan gave its governor large powers in the creation and administration of a purchasing commission and to control the prices, and later the American banking group became active. During 1916 prices were advanced from 6⅝ cents per pound c. i. f. New York to as high as 14 cents per pound. These prices provoked much indignation in the United States, and a Senate inquiry extending from February to April, 1916, establishing the existence of a combination but resulted in no correction.

Sisal is used to harvest wheat, oats, rye, and barley in the United States. Previous attempts to grow sisal in the United States have been unsuccessful, and in 1922 it was tried in Florida.

Sisal is a tropical plant and can not live if the temperature falls to the freezing point at any time.

United States v. Sisal Sales Corporation of New York, October term, 1926, United States Supreme Court (274 U. S. 268)

The United States sought an injunction to prevent the Sisal Corporation from taking further action in pursuance of a combination said to be forbidden by the Sherman antitrust law and the Wilson Tariff Act.

The Sisal Corporation consists of three banking corporations, two Delaware corporations organized to deal in sisal, and a Mexican corporation which buys sisal from producers.

It is shown that the annual requirements of the United States are 250,000,000 to 300,000,000 pounds per annum and that Yucatan is the only place it can be obtained and that the price runs from 4 to 7 cents per pound.

The Mexican corporation, Commision Reguladora, was used as a buying cover and then came the collapse. The corporation disposed of competition in the trade and excessive prices were arbitrarily fixed.

The court held that the combination was illegal and sought to control both the machinery and the sale of sisal with combined monopoly of external and internal trade therein.

The United States complains not merely of the violation of their laws subject to their jurisdiction but something done by another Government at the instigation of a private party.

POTASH

Prior to 1919, Germany had little competition from American potash manufacturers. At that time American companies sprang up and Germany's monopoly became endangered. Nothing was done until 1921 when, because of increased production in Germany, 34 American manufacturers of fertilizers were forced to sign contracts with the German Kali Syndicate for the importation of potash to the United States. The potash industry in the United States was rapidly decreasing and things were made more serious on September 22, 1922, when potash was put on the free list. But potash had been discovered in western Texas and immediately potash production in the United States increased. By the end of 1922 production was slightly greater than in the preceding year.

In 1922, 12 plants produced 25,176 tons of crude material, averaging 45.6 per cent of potash. The average value in 1922 was 41 cents per unit (20 pounds). Even with the increase of 1922 production did not equal the record of 1919—four times the amount of 1922.

Until 1915 potash came to the United States chiefly from Germany; from 1916 to 1920 from many different countries; and in 1921 to 1924 from Germany, France, and Belgium. In 1918 the United States Geological Survey was making advanced researches in Texas.

In 1924 Germany and Alsace regained their former monopoly by forming an agreement to operate on an established basis of cooperation in the sale of potash to the United States. It went into effect on May 1, 1924. At this time the Trona Corporation was the largest American manufacturer of potash. The prices at this time were $31.09½ to $35.55 per ton for 80 per cent muriate; $45.85 per ton for 90 per cent sulphate.

In 1924 activity in California died out, and Maryland took the lead, producing 10,302 short tons of crude material composed of 33.3 per cent pure potash. Potash has been discovered and successfully mined in Utah, near Salt Lake City.

Germany has always been foremost in the production of potash and its elements. Alsace and France have also been important. American producers of potash have to contend with the cheap production cost of foreign potash and the fact that it is on the free list. In 1922 potash stocks were floated on the market and went to a high level which they were unable to maintain. American farmers—the chief consumers of potash—do not believe that American potash is as good as the foreign product.

It is this fact that must be understood by those who use potash before the higher-priced American product can ever hope to attain the favor that German imports now enjoy—that American potash is purer and, if it were more in demand, could undersell the foreign product.

In 1924 foreign potash was at low price levels, while American increased its gain of 1923. There were 11 plants operating. Production in 1924 was 13 per cent greater.

Potash produced in 1924, by States

In 1924 there were 222,245 tons of potash used in the United States, valued at $14,218,900; about 94 per cent of this was used as fertilizer; 90.2 per cent of this was imported.

In 1925 the increase in production of American potash was 11 per cent in the pure potash and 18 per cent in the crude salts. The Trona Co. was the chief manufacturer at this time; they operated mostly in California. This year 258,217 tons were imported into the United States. Germany and France were the chief contributors to this amount. Prices rose about 40 cents a ton in the lower grades, but remained the same in the higher grades. In 1925 the United States manufactured 23,086 metric tons.

Production in 1926 decreased 8 per cent in the pure potash and 10 per cent in the crude product. There were 23,366 tons manufactured in 1926 in the United States, while 266,280 tons were imported from Germany and France. Prices advanced from 15 to 20 per cent in the cheaper grades, while the finer grades went up 3 and 4 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, we have had a great number of farm relief bills introduced and prepared by different people, but we have one now that bears the unique distinction of having been prepared by Mr. J. J. Raskob, chairman of the finance committee of the General Motors Corporation.

They call this bill one that will help the farmer in buying automobiles, sisal, potash, and other raw materials, but, as is demonstrated in the hearings, it is nothing in the world but a rubber bill and an attempt to control the price of rubber in this country.

You have heard, and will hear more, about the control by the British Government. You have heard about the collapse of the Stevenson Act yesterday. But what has been going on in this country? When rubber prices were $1.20 a pound, there was formed in this country this association of rubber men and automobile people. They went into the market; they formed a pool and they bought rubber; and they lowered the price to some 50 cents a pound. It has been going down and down from that time on under the operation of that pool, and I might add right here that that pool has been operating without any criticism whatever from the Department of Justice. It has been operating without any prosecution on the part of the Department of Justice; and, as is shown in Mr. Davis's letter and Mr. Hughes's letter—those two eminent law firms that write the identical letter here as to this kind of legislation—this pool has had no criticism whatever from the Department of Justice, but they want to legalize something that they have been doing that might perchance and perhaps be illegal.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes.

Mr. DYER. This same thing happened when we considered the Webb-Pomerene Act for export trade. That act was not considered to be necessary, in the opinion of the committee.

Mr. DOMINICK. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that the Webb-Pomerene Act was passed in 1918, during war times. I do not know how I voted on it, but I am like my friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], in that if I voted for it and voted wrong at that time, that is no reason why I should vote wrong at this time.

Mr. WELLER. Did you vote wrong at that time?

Mr. DOMINICK. I do not know. I have not looked into it. I might have voted against it. I doubt very much if we had a roll call, because in those times there were very few things on which there was a division.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman voted for it. There were only 29 Members in the House who voted against it when the vote was taken.

Mr. DOMINICK. Gentlemen, on the 19th day of March the Associated Press dispatches carried a statement as to this rubber pool and its condition. It made the statement that the day before a certain banking and trust company in the city of New York had transferred to that pool $60,000,000 more in order to help them out in the control of the price of rubber, which would make, I think, some $110,000,000 which would be in the control of that pool at this time.

But what else do we find in that dispatch? We find further along in the dispatch that the rubber pool had on hand at that time 65,000 tons of crude rubber that cost them 41 cents a pound, and the further statement that the pool up to that time had lost money on their purchases, as rubber was selling at that time at 24 cents a pound.

Now, what does that mean? They have 65,000 tons of rubber that cost them 41 cents; rubber was quoted at 24½ cents a pound on that day, and the pool had a large loss in it. There were different ideas as to why this $60,000,000 loan was made by the rubber pool, but I believe that the real reason is expressed in a portion of an editorial from the Washington Post of March 20, which I will read:

> The British rubber restrictions have not worked out wholly as anticipated. When the American pool first entered the market it purchased rubber estimated at 65,000 tons at from 35 to 41 cents a pound. The influence of this heavy holding, together with talk of synthetic rubber and the activities of Harvey Firestone, Henry Ford, and other Americans who are systematically working out plans for production of their own rubber, have combined to force prices down to the present level of about 25 cents a pound. The pool, therefore, has lost money on its holdings. Yet price stabilization undoubtedly has to a greater or less degree offset such loss, and if rubber has reached a low level, as many believe, it is probable that rubber purchased with the new loan will advance in price enough to offset the earlier losses.

In other words, they have $60,000,000 with which to go into the market now and buy low rubber at 21 cents a pound, and then raise the price of this rubber to the consumers of rubber in this country, and thereby recoup their losses in the rubber they now hold, the loss being the difference between 41 cents, which they paid for it, and 21 cents a pound, which it is worth now, on 65,000 tons. And yet they say this is not a trust.

There is one thing about it in my mind, gentlemen. If you start to make more exceptions to the antitrust laws you might as well except everything and repeal all of them.

They talk about sisal and potash, but they do not include nitrate of soda, which is largely used by a great many of our farmers. I am frank to say that at one time when we were considering this bill, and before I looked into it carefully, I made a motion to amend by inserting nitrate of soda, but I got to thinking that there were very few beneficent and benevolent trusts, and that we had better keep nitrate of soda out.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Nitrates are in to-day just as much as rubber, are they not?

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes; I presume they are included in "other raw materials."

Mr. MICHENER. At the time the gentleman offered his amendment the bill was written a little differently than it came out of committee.

Mr. DOMINICK. I suppose nitrate of soda is supposed to be included in "other raw materials," but it is not specifically included.

Mr. MICHENER. Nitrates are included to-day just as much as rubber or anything else.

Mr. DOMINICK. What I am speaking about is that it is not specifically named in the bill.

Mr. DYER. We will have no objection if the gentleman wants to put that in.

Mr. DOMINICK. No; I want to strike them all out.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Is there anything in the bill which would make illegal such a pool in the future if the owners or those interested in the pool were to be the same owners of the stock of these corporations, the manufacturers who buy the rubber?

Mr. DOMINICK. As I understand it, there is nothing that would prevent such a combination.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. If there is a community of interest in ownership between the manufacturers of automobiles who buy rubber and these people who are now buying rubber, that would not illegalize the bill?

Mr. DOMINICK. No. Under this bill, as I understand it, automobile manufacturers and tire interests will join in the pool. Both are in the present pool.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. And if this pool were to pool with the European pool would it still be legal?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely. The bars are down and the sky is the limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. DOMINICK. That is as nearly as I can answer it.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. So there is no limit imposed upon them?

Mr. DOMINICK. Not as I see it. If there is, I do not know it. Now, gentlemen, they talk about sisal, potash, nitrates, and other raw materials for the farmers, and say this bill will help them as well. I would like for any man who is familiar with the antitrust laws to point out to me one word in those statutes which prohibits the farmers and their cooperative associations from combining and making these purchases without giving this kind of authority to them. On the other hand, they are exempt now, as I understand the law, and they can form their pools and make their purchases in any manner they see fit.

Mr. STEVENSON. As a matter of fact, the State of South Carolina has authorized its commissioner of agriculture to buy for the whole State.

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes. They are buying it now and have been doing it for the last few years. They have been buying nitrates from the Chilean coast without any interference whatever from the trust laws. We do not need this legislation for that purpose. The legislation is solely in favor of the rubber interests and it is solely in order to give them a legalized monopoly so that they can go to work and do as they please without any interference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on February 18, 1926, I discussed in detail the rubber problem. In that address I called attention to the development of rubber plantations in the Middle East. I showed the cost of bringing a rubber plantation into bearing, the acreage in the Indian Archipelago planted, and the acreage tappable; also the production of plantation rubber as compared with the production of wild rubber. I shall not on this occasion repeat all the statistics and the arguments which I made upon that occasion. If you desire first hand, dependable, and official information on the rubber problem, I believe it will be worth while for you to read my remarks on the date to which I referred.

I am opposed to this bill because by its terms it expressly authorizes the creation of a monopoly and seeks in advance to exempt that monopoly from the provisions of the antitrust law.

I have never yet, knowingly, voted for any measure which I believe created a monopoly or a trust, or that would license a big business organization to exploit or plunder the people, and as long as I am a Member of this body, my vote will never be given to any bill which has for its object the creation of a monopoly or the legalizing of a trust, because in the last analysis the masses of the people must inevitably "pay the freight" in the increased price which comes from the exactions of all monopolies; and in the present commercial age, we have no such thing as a benevolent monopoly any more than benevolent despotisms. All monopolies, like all despotisms, are oppressive. They are created for the express purpose of getting a stronger strangle hold upon the common people, and any man in this body that votes to create this monopoly, and exempt it in advance from the sin of pitiless exploitation of the public, is voting to impose a heavy burden upon the masses of the American people that will bend their backs and unreasonably increase the cost of their necessary commodities.

There are several outstanding reasons why this bill should not be enacted:

First. The bill will authorize the creation of a hard and fast monopoly and a trust on raw material purchased by combinations, associations and buying pools.

Second. It will substantially advance the prices that the consumers will have to pay for these raw commodities and for the articles manufactured out of these trust-controlled supplies. The provisions in the bills designed to prevent arbitrary advance in prices to consumers are weak, grossly inadequate and will prove ineffective.

Third. The bill, if it becomes a law, will give the big manufacturers a tremendous advantage over the small fellows, who will be driven out of business.

Fourth. The plain purpose of the bill is to take us out of the hands of a foreign monopoly and put us in the power of an American monopoly that would bleed the masses as unconscionably as the alleged foreign monopoly. An American monopoly is as bad as a foreign monopoly. Either will bleed the people white if you only give them a chance, and this bill gives the Rubber Trust a sure chance to extort hundreds if millions of dollars from the consumers of rubber in the United States.

Fifth. There is no emergency or necessity for this legislation. The Stevenson plan has failed to work and do what it was expected to do. Rubber is now selling at a ridiculously low price. The Stevenson plan broke down completely, for two reasons, (a) because it was fundamentally wrong and impractical as a permanent governmental policy, and (b) because the Dutch Government, by refusing to join Great Britain in her policy of restricting exportation of crude rubber, annually dumped on the market an ever-increasing supply of crude rubber that more than made up for the quantity withheld by Great Britain. This maintained the supply in excess of the demand, and finally broke the market and reduced prices to a supply and demand basis.

Sixth. The measure is essentially a bill to create a monopoly on rubber, which in my opinion will be more exacting than the recent plan of the British Government to control the price of crude rubber. By this bill we will commit the government to the policy of creating monopolies and turning them loose to prey on the public. This bill would be in effect a license to big business to form a trust, create a monopoly, and fleece the people. The principle is fundamentally wrong. If enacted, this bill will cost the American people untold millions of dollars. If we can license a rubber monopoly, we can, with as much grace license monopolies to control the price and market of other commodities. The principle of this bill is extremely vicious. All monopolies are odious. All monopolies prey on the people. All monopolies arbitrarily and unreasonably increase the price of commodities to the consumers. Every monopoly robs the masses to enrich a favored few. Monopolies are undemocratic, unrepublican, and un-American.

Seventh. While reference is made in the bill to sisal, potash, and a few other commodities on which it is claimed there are monopolies, this bill has for its primary object, yes, its sole object, the creation of a monopoly on crude rubber, and by controlling the raw material, this trust will have a monopoly on the articles manufactured out of crude rubber. This law will give the Rubber Trust a strangle hold on the automobile business in the United States.

The bill will do nothing in the way of reducing the price of sisal, potash, and other commodities that the farmers use and are interested in. Those articles are merely mentioned in passing and put in the bill as a bait to the farmers of America to sugar-coat this bitter and poisonous bill and induce the members of this House who come from agricultural districts to vote for it. The reference to sisal, potash, and a few other commodities used by farmers is not made in good faith, and is a delusion and a snare. Do not be deceived, this is not a bill to help the farmers, but a bill to bleed the farmers and other users of rubber tires and other commodities in the manufacture of which rubber enters.

If the present administration want to help the American farmers, why not enact the McNary-Haugen bill, which is demanded by the agricultural classes of America? Why fuss and fool around with this petty, contemptuous bill that is designed to fool the farmer and build up a gigantic rubber monopoly? The big rubber companies in the United States are behind this bill and this may well be designated as a bill to license the greedy rubber companies in the United States to create a monopoly and fleece the American people.

Much has been said in this discussion about the Stevenson plan, the plan that was formulated and put into operation under the administration of Sir Robert Horne, as Chancellor of the British Exchequer. At the head of the committee that framed this plan was Sir James Stevenson. The so-called Stevenson plan is not an act of the British Parliament but an order made by the British Colonial Office to limit the exportation of rubber from the British colonies in India, Burma, and the Malayan Archipelago. After its approval by the British Ministry it was referred to and ratified by the provincial governments of all the British colonies producing plantation rubber.

Twenty years ago practically all of our crude rubber was gathered from the primeval forests. The plant or tree which produces crude rubber is indigenous to all equatorial regions. Different species of the rubber tree are found in different regions, but rubber-producing trees are found in all equatorial regions. The crude rubber produced from different trees is not always of the same grade or value.

By odds the most productive and valuable rubber tree is the hevea, which flourishes in a natural state in uplands of the Amazon watershed.

There are two principal species of the hevea tree, namely, the Hevea benthamiana and Hevea brasiliensis. The former is indigenous to the northern part of the Amazon watershed and is found along the tributaries that flow into the Amazon from the north, while the latter is indigenous to the plateaus on the southern slope of the Amazon and is found on the uplands along the Amazon's tributaries that enter that mighty river from the south.

It has been conclusively demonstrated that the Hevea brasiliensis is the most productive and yields the highest quality of crude rubber. It is officially estimated that there are more than 300,000,000 hevea rubber trees in the Amazon watershed untouched and untapped, varying in size from 2 to 3 or 4 feet in diameter and from 60 to 80 feet high. Before plantation growing of rubber became common, natives at stated intervals went through the pathless forests, tapping or bleeding the rubber trees and collecting the sap or milk for export. But within the last two decades the people have found a better, cheaper, and more dependable way of securing crude rubber than by having the natives gather it from the wilds of tropical forests.

I am not defending the action of the British Government in restricting exportation of rubber from its colonies, but I do say that the people of Great Britain have done more to develop the plantation growing of rubber and to furnish the world a sure source of supply than all other nations combined. As far back as in 1869 the British Government, with far-seeing vision, began to experiment in the growing of plantation rubber. The English people, with their wonderful genius for commerce, began to plan for the production of an adequate supply of crude rubber without having to depend on wild savages to gather it from the almost impenetrable forests. They were 50 years ahead of the rest of the world on the rubber problem.

It has been said in this debate that as a result of the Stevenson plan the British secured a monopoly on the world's supply of crude rubber. Why, bless your unsophisticated souls, there never was a time since rubber became an important article of commerce that Great Britain did not have a monopoly upon rubber. English traders went into the remote regions of the earth and captured the rubber trade of the world long before the plantation growing of rubber was seriously considered, and when the automobile came here was old John Bull waiting, with a monopoly on the world's supply of crude rubber and ready to rake off the enormous profits that were inevitable because of such control. The American people have no one to blame but themselves. They went along complacently and allowed the English to capture the world's supply of rubber, and when the colonists of Great Britain began to pull down big profits from their investments the big rubber barons of the United States bellowed like petulant and spoiled children.

Before rubber was grown on plantations in commercial quantities, Great Britain had a monopoly upon the exportation of rubber from Brazil and other rubber-producing regions, and she has had a stranglehold upon rubber ever since it has had a commercial value; but in 1869 the British, looking far into the future, began to plan for a permanent supply of crude rubber grown on British soil. Without knowing it, they began at that time to plan for the automobile age and for a monopoly on the rubber supply of the world. They began experimenting with the seed of the hevea rubber tree with a view of planting these trees in India and other colonial possessions.

At that time Brazil, in order to maintain her rich rubber trade, prohibited the exportation of the seed of the hevea rubber tree. In 1876 Henry Alexander Wickham, an Englishman, owned a little 500-acre rubber plantation in the upper reaches of the Amazon River. He was requested by the representatives of the Indian Office in London to obtain 70,000 hevea rubber tree seeds. The germinating life of these seeds was only three weeks, so quick action was necessary. He chartered a tramp steamer, obtained an immediate clearance by telling the shipping authorities that he was carrying rare and perishable botanical specimens to the Queen, and raced the shipment to England. I mention this, not to approve the misrepresentation and deceit of Wickham, but to show how determined these English were to get the seed with which to conduct their experiments. With these hevea seeds experiments were conducted. So with these experiments in the British Botanic Garden at Kew, England, and from cuttings and seedlings, 10,000 plants in 1876 were sent to Burma, Ceylon, Java, and other portions of the East Indian Archipelago. They were planted in these new regions with varying success, but in time the venture was successful, and plantations were planted on a large scale.

Prior to 1905 plantation rubber was produced only in a negligible quantity.

In 1905 the exports of plantation rubber from the Middle East amounted only to 174 tons. At that time over 99 per cent of all the crude rubber of commerce was wild rubber gathered by natives from forests and jungle. At the present time 95 per cent of all the crude rubber of the world comes from the plantations in British India, Netherland East India, and the Indian Archipelago.

So, as a matter of fact, my friends, if the English people have had a monopoly upon rubber, it is because they have had vision; it is because they have had the courage to experiment with rubber, and to invest more than $500,000,000 in rubber plantations, until, at the present time more than 4,000,000 acres in British India and in the Netherland East Indies and in the East Indian Archipelago are planted to rubber, and now all the world must go to these rubber plantations for its supply of crude rubber. The people of the United States could have had this monopoly, or at least a substantial control of the world's supply of crude rubber, if they had looked ahead and invested in rubber plantations as the English did.

In 1921, after the war, the plantations in the Middle East were facing bankruptcy. The price of rubber went down until it sold below the cost of production. In order to avert disaster many of these plantation owners entered into a voluntary agreement by which they obligated themselves to restrict production 25 per cent, but being unable to enforce this agreement, they applied to the British Colonial Office for relief, and the so-called Stevenson plan was originated.

This plan did not become operative until November 1, 1922. At the time it was formulated Great Britain believed that the Netherlands Government would join in this plan of restriction, but after protracted negotiations the Netherlands Government refused to have anything to do with the proposition, so Great Britain decided to "go it alone," although many leading men in England vigorously opposed the plan as impractical and foredoomed to failure, because the Netherlands Government, by unrestricted exportations, could defeat the Stevenson plan and keep the world rubber market on a supply-and-demand basis.

The Dutch Government not only refused to follow the Stevenson plan, but they began immediately to plant hundreds of thousands of acres of new rubber groves. And by the way, gentlemen, those groves which the people of the Netherlands planted in 1920 and 1921 and 1922 are now coming into bearing. Depending, of course, on climatic conditions, a rubber tree in the Middle East will come into bearing in about six or seven years. So, as a result of unrestricted exportation by the Netherlands Government, and because of the rapidly increasing supply of rubber from Netherland East Indies, the Stevenson plan signally failed to function efficiently, except for the first year or two.

Now, what is the so-called Stevenson plan? In short, it regulated the quantity of crude rubber exported from British possessions by a sliding scale which increased or decreased the export duty according to the price that rubber had sold for during the preceding quarter in Mincing Lane, London, which is the Wall Street for rubber.

If the average price of rubber in London was under 21 pence (42 cents), but not under 15 pence (30 cents) a pound, during any quarter, the exportable percentage of standard production for the ensuing quarter at the minimum rate of duty was reduced by 10.

If the average price of any quarter was not under 21 pence (42 cents), but was less than 24 pence (48 cents), there was to be no change in the ensuing quarter.

If the average price for any quarter was 24 pence (48 cents) or more, the percentage of exportable production was to be increased by 10 for the ensuing quarter.

To illustrate: No matter how low the price might be, 60 per cent of the standard production could be exported at the minimum duty. If the average price for the quarter was between 15 pence and 21 pence (30 cents and 42 cents), the exportable percentage was reduced by 10 per cent for the ensuing quarter. And if the average price for the next quarter was between 21 pence and 24 pence (42 cents and 48 cents), no change was made in the exportable percentage. And if the average price for the quarter was 24 pence (48 cents) or more, the exportable percentage was increased 10 per cent.

It will be seen that the plan was cumbersome and economically unsound. It would have failed because of its own inherent weaknesses, but its failure was made inevitable and hastened by the refusal of the Netherlands Government to adopt any restrictive measures. So, while Great Britain restricted exports, the Netherlands increased their exports, which made up for the quantities withheld by the British. This left the market on a supply-and-demand basis, and in spite of the efforts of the British to create artificial conditions and to arbitrarily manipulate the market.

Yesterday the British Prime Minister announced that the Stevenson plan would be abandoned November 1. This is a confession that it has been a failure and has not accomplished the purpose intended. This makes it unnecessary for Congress to pass this or any other measure of a similar purport.

I hope this measure will meet the overwhelming defeat it deserves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] 10 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I heard with interest the speech of my colleague [Mr. WELLER], but I feel that he does not speak for all of the people of New York City, whence he and I come. I think he is enthusiastically misguided on this proposition. The consumers in New York who would be vitally affected by this bill fear a trust. They are suffering from the many trusts and combinations the present administration has allowed. They fear a trust like the plague. They do not trust a trust. All I can see in this bill is the creation of a very huge monopoly or trust in the interest of the rubber companies of this country.

I have examined the hearings very carefully and have tried to find something about this invisible pool that has been operating for several years, but everything seems to be shrouded in mystery and secrecy. I would like to know more about this "control" or pool that seems to have been born illegally and which this bill seeks to make legitimate. I would like to ask what right Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce—what right he had to put the seal of his approval on this pool or combination? Evidently it was upon the authority of such eminent counsel as Mr. Davis and Mr. Hughes that the pool operators came to us and asked for this bill. Messrs. Davis and Hughes know that the pool is illegal.

I ask the speakers hereafter to tell us and answer what right the Secretary of Commerce had to approve, if he did not create this pool? Are we a government of laws, or are we a government of men? Shall the Attorney General in one breadth say that this proposition is illegal and in the other breath say it is legal? I ask the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee to examine the proceedings in the office of the Attorney General, and I ask them to examine the case of the United States against the Sisal Sales Corporation (274 U. S. 268), where the Attorney General instituted proceedings against the sisal monopoly. It was illegal to pool interests to import sisal from Mexico. Why was it not just as illegal for Mr. Ford, Mr. Firestone, Mr. Raskob, and others to form a pool to import rubber? Why are they immune from the operation of the antitrust laws? Maybe they are heavy contributors to the Republican Party.

Some one said Mr. Hoover had nothing to do with the formation of the voluntary pool in rubber. That is not so. He had much to do with it.

On page 28 of the hearings I find this statement of Mr. J. J. Raskob, of the General Motors Co.:

> We immediately got in touch with the Rubber Association of America, and Mr. Firestone, as well as the Department of Justice and the Department of Commerce. This was over 18 months ago, and to make a long story short, we evolved a plan that resulted in the formation of a $50,000,000 buying pool, which dealt in rubber throughout the whole year 1927, and all connected with that effort, including Mr. Secretary Hoover, who has just addressed you, have advised me that they believe that that pool was instrumental in driving the rubber speculator out of the market, with the result that the fluctuation in the price of rubber during that year was reduced to 9 cents, which is the greatest degree of stability in rubber in the last 20 years.

If this does not tie up Mr. Hoover with this pool, I miss my guess.

They have been caught in a very embarrassing situation by the collapse of the Stevenson plan. Now, I ask the speakers that follow me to answer this question. The pool will stand a loss of $19,000,000 if we can believe the report in this morning's New York Times, which is as follows:

> The American rubber pool, which is understood to hold between 35,000 and 40,000 tons purchased at 41 cents, to which about 2 cents a pound due to warehousing, interest, and other charges may be added, is reputed to face a paper loss of about 22 cents a pound, or 50 per cent, on its holdings, the value of this loss amounting to approximately $19,000,000 since the purchase of the stocks in November and December of 1926.

They purchased rubber around 40 cents a pound, and the price is now 20½ cents a pound. Will you and I, gentlemen, profit by this reduction? Will the United States Rubber Co., the General Tire Co., the Firestone people, and other members of the pool who paid this large price give us the benefit of the reduction to 20½ cents a pound or are we, particularly in New York, going to pay for this excess price—are we going to hold the bag for the Rubber Trust? Will not our tires remain the same in price? They will pass their present rubber stocks on to us in the form of tires not at 20½ cents but at 40 cents per pound of crude rubber. That is how the pool works.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I will.

Mr. STOBBS. The gentleman does not mean to contend that the sole purpose of the legislation is to enable the people interested in rubber in this country to take advantage of their loss and put it on the consumers?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; the Rubber Trust took advantage of the misguided advice of the Secretary of Commerce and the Department of Justice and suffered a great loss. I am asking the gentleman if they are not going to carry that loss back to the consumers?

Mr. STOBBS. What was the price of rubber at the time the pool was initiated or at the time they went to the Department of Commerce?

Mr. CELLER. I will come to that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to point out that when the market was slumping the pool went out and stiffened the market to keep the price up.

Mr. CELLER. I thank the gentleman. Now, will some gentleman tell us when the rubber pool was formed? Will you tell us who the subscribers were; how much each man subscribed and how much rubber was purchased; what was the average cost; and tell us the lowest price paid? Who managed the pool? Did the pool buy from the United States Rubber Co.—a member of the pool—which company, through its subsidiary companies, operates nearly 83,000 acres of rubber plantations and has 60,000 acres more in reserve? Did the pool export any rubber? Did they buy rubber from the Dutch companies as well as the British?

We are not told whether the independents could come in and participate in the pool, nor are we told whether this pool was operated for profit, and if so, for whose profit. If the situation is so mysterious and nobody seems to have the hardihood even to ask these questions of anyone who appeared before the committee, then how much more mysterious will be the operation of the pool under this bill? I might ask this: Is the pool to be legalized now to be conducted for profit, and, if for profit, in whose behalf is the profit to be earned? For the members of the pool? Why do not the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee provide for governmental supervision over this pool? No provision is made in this bill that the Government shall have control over this pool. This pool can run wild, and there is no method by which the interests of the consumer or the American public might be safeguarded. True, if it violates the Sherman or Clayton Acts, it gets into trouble. That provision is merely "beau geste." If the pool now can operate illegally, what assurance have we that after we legitimatize it it will not still be immune from punishment for any of its sins?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I refuse to yield further. There is ample provision in the law now to get after these combinations formed in Europe or elsewhere. The underlying purpose of this bill is to legalize pools or "controls" to import rubber, sisal, and potash, or any other commodity certified by Mr. Hoover where "controls" or monopolies exist in those commodities outside the United States. As the law now stands there is ample remedy to dissolve these foreign combinations just as soon as they seek to export into the United States the said rubber, sisal, potash, and so forth.

A few weeks ago the Attorney General seized some ships in New York harbor containing quinine, and he has instituted equity proceedings against the combination that sought to monopolize the supply of quinine. In addition indictments have been found against the members of the foreign combine and they will be brought to book. If we have that remedy, and there surely is a remedy, why not apply it to rubber, and why have we not a suitable adequate remedy as the law stands to-day? The Attorney General could bring suit to dissolve the British rubber combine as soon as it touched our shores.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. And with reference to potash, I quite agree with my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] that potash and sisal are put in as a sort of excess baggage, a sort of window dressing or make weight. With reference to potash, action was instituted by this same Attorney General in the United States District Court of the Southern District of New York, against the Potash Trust, and Justice Bondy has reserved decision on the question of whether or not the Potash Trust is in restraint of trade and a monopoly. It is significant that the French nation has introduced a peculiar defense. It has raised the question of sovereign immunity on the score that the French Government owns eleven-fifteenths of the stock of one of the potash defendants, but upon close examination—and I put into the RECORD some of the statements in the Attorney General's brief submitted—it will clearly appear that when a government, the French Government or any other government, enters into business trade it must make itself amenable to court processes. The United States Government, when it organized the Sugar Equalization Board, and when it organized the United States Shipping Board, did not render those entities immune from the proceedings of the courts, and so the French Government can not say, that because it owns some of the stock in the potash combination, it shall be immune from prosecution.

I herewith give extracts from the brief submitted by the United States Government in case of United States of America against Deutsches Kalisyndikat Gesellschaft et al.:

> The claim of immunity in this case is put forward not on behalf of the French Republic itself, but on behalf of a trading corporation in which the French Republic happens to be a majority (but not a controlling) stockholder.

Société Commerciale des Potasses d'Alsace maintained an office at 25 West Forty-third Street, in this city and district, at the time when service of the subpœna was effected in this suit. The société is a trading corporation organized under the ordinary corporation laws of France. It is recognized in French law as an entity distinct from its stockholders, and it may sue and be sued in the French courts like any other corporation.

A. Sovereign immunity can not be successfully claimed even by a corporation owned or controlled by the domestic sovereign.

Thus in United States Bank v. Planters Bank (9 Wheat. 904) it was held that the fact that the State of Georgia owned a large part of the stock of a bank did not make a suit against the bank equivalent to a suit against the State of Georgia, or render the bank immune from suit under the eleventh amendment. In that case Chief Justice Marshall pointed out (9 Wheat. 904, 907):

"It is, we think, a sound principle that when a government becomes a partner in any trading company it divests itself, so far as concerns the transactions of that company, of its sovereign character and takes that of a private citizen. Instead of communicating to the company its privileges and its prerogatives, it descends to a level with those with whom it associates itself, and takes the character which belongs to its associates and to the business which is to be transacted.

Federal Sugar Refining Co. v. United States Sugar Equalization Board (D. C., S. D., N. Y., 1920), 268 Fed. 575. (Sugar Equalization Board, a Delaware corporation, not immune from suit, though United States owned all of stock.)

Commercial Pacific Cable Co. v. Philippine National Bank (D. C., S. D., N. Y., 1920), 263 Fed. 218; affd. 2d C. C. A., 269 Fed. 1022. (Philippine National Bank not entitled to assert rights vested in United States as sovereign, though United States owned majority of stock and president of bank was appointed by Governor General.)

B. The same principle with respect to immunity applies to corporations owned or controlled by a foreign sovereign as to those owned or controlled by the domestic sovereign; and a corporation partly owned by a foreign government is entitled to no greater immunity than a corporation wholly owned by the United States or a State.

In addition the Secretary of State, in this case, refused to recognize the defense of immunity. This, in and of itself, must force Judge Bondy to render a decision in favor of the Government.

In the present case, the letter of the Secretary of State, stating that these claimants have no right to sovereign immunity, is, therefore, conclusive of their claim in this court. In his note to the Attorney General the Secretary of State, in reference to both the corporate and individual applicants, states the following as the position of the Department of State:

"I had previously been informed by your department that the proceedings, in connection with which the above-mentioned note of the French ambassador was addressed to me, were brought by your department to enjoin alleged violations of the Sherman Act and the anti-trust provisions of the Wilson tariff act, in connection with the importation and distribution of potash in this country, and that it had been urged in that suit that sovereign immunity should extend to the defendants on the ground that they are acting as representatives of the French Government in the commercial undertaking referred to.

"With respect to your inquiry concerning the view of this department regarding the matter, I have to inform you that it has long been the view of the Department of State that agencies of foreign governments engaged in ordinary commercial transactions in the United States enjoy no privileges or immunities not appertaining to other foreign corporations, agencies, and individuals doing business here, and should conform to the laws of this country governing such transactions."

The Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Jardine, seemed worried about this case and urged the passage of this bill because of the possibilities of the defense of the French Government of sovereign immunity being recognized. I say to the Secretary of Agriculture there is nothing to worry about. The potash combine will be dissolved. In any event, why not wait until decision is rendered. That decision may be in favor of our Government. Perhaps Mr. Jardine is wishing for a different decision.

Why potash was put in the bill is beyond me. Nobody seems to have complained about potash. The National Fertilizer Association (see p. 41 and following of the hearings) presented tables of retail and wholesale costs of potash and said there seems to be no "price abuses or attempts at profiteering" as far as potash is concerned:

Such interest as we have in the matter would become active only if attempts were to be made in the future unfairly to exact excessive prices. Of this there is no present indication.

Now, what is the situation as to nitrates? This same National Fertilizer Association (at p. 46 of the hearings) indicates that the Chilean nitrate combination has not been inflating prices and that, on the contrary, there seems to be "a deep-seated desire on the part of the Chilean producers to secure volume of business at a reasonable price rather than excessive profits on a smaller volume of business."

Even Mr. Hoover emphatically stated, when he appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, January 18, 1926 (p. 297, hearings on crude rubber, coffee, and so forth, before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 59th Cong., 1st sess., H. R. 59), that—

The nitrate problem seems to me to be bound up with the action of Congress in respect to Muscle Shoals in two aspects. First, I have no doubt that the ultimate contention is to devote that large power to a considerable degree to the manufacture of nitrogen; and, second, the settlement of the question will take a disturbing factor out of the development of the industry at private hands. In other words, we might have had a larger development of private industry in the fixation of nitrogen except that they are waiting to see what disposition is made of Muscle Shoals. In any event a settlement of that question will expedite our whole freedom of the nitrate situation.

It seems to me that the rubber and tire people have little to complain about. I herewith submit for the years 1923 to 1927, inclusive, the net profits of six of the leading companies. These profits speak for themselves.

Net profits available for dividends or to carry surplus; i. e., after all expenses, depreciation, interest, and provision for taxes have been deducted.

It was my understanding that this bill was devised to legalize the rubber importing pool in order to combat the British rubber control. Since Premier Baldwin has announced in the House of Commons that the Stevenson plan shall be at an end as of November 1 next, therefore the cause of the instant bill has been removed.

On the other hand, if we pass this bill it is bound to create ill will in England and may have the effect of reestablishing the British Stevenson plan or pool. Let us be satisfied that the British Government has acknowledged defeat of its plan. Let us not spoil our victory by forcing England to reestablish the plan as a sort of defensive measure.

It is foolhardy to argue that Premier Baldwin has discarded the Stevenson plan because of our activity in the House to pass this bill. That plan was discarded because it proved ineffectual. Great Britain can not control the entire rubber supply of the world. That plan has greatly encouraged native rubber production in the Dutch East Indies. Permit me to insert an extract from an article appearing in the Commerce Monthly, February 27, 1927, issued by the National Bank of Commerce, New York:

The influence of the native industry on the world's rubber trade seems destined to increase yearly. Undoubtedly it has been a most important factor in limiting the effect of the British restriction plan, which regulates according to price the amount of rubber exported from the British possessions. Native rubber is rubber produced on plantations or gardens owned by the local non-European population. Native rubber from the Dutch East Indies, amounting to only 3 per cent of the world production in 1920, constituted between 10 and 15 per cent in 1926. In this period the total output rose from 344,000 tons to 625,000 tons.

Native production will continue unabated as long as the price of rubber remains as high as 9 to 18 cents a pound, according to a Dutch investigator. At such prices the margin of profit is sufficient to satisfy the native workers. This explains why restriction, which set 24 cents a pound and later 42 cents in London, as the price below which reduction in the rate of export takes place, has proved such a boon to the native. It actually guaranteed him a handsome profit as long as it was operative. Advantage seems to be on the side of the native and the 1926 native output of 75,000 to 80,000 tons may easily be doubled by 1930 and the industry more firmly established.

Dutch rubber was the undoing of the British Stevenson plan. When England restricted its rubber output invisible sources of rubber were tapped and the market became glutted with rubber and as a consequence the price has been declining steadily.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] has shown on a chart the peak price for rubber, I believe it was in 1924, and he claims it is a result of the Stevenson plan, sometimes called the "restriction" plan. The cause of that peak price was in part the introduction of the balloon tire and the work of rubber circulators.

After the restriction act went into effect the price of rubber rose to 37 cents in January, 1923, and declined to 18¼ cents in June, 1924, rising to 40 cents in December, 1924. To the effect of curtailed shipments, on the one hand, there was added the effect of largely increased consumption on the other, so that the operation of natural forces would have eventually restored a balance. Practically no one, however, foresaw the enormous increase that was to take place in the production of automobiles and trucks during the years since then, causing a need for rubber that is now five times what it was a decade ago. This phenomenal demand was further augmented in 1924 by the introduction of the balloon tire, which requires much more material than the high-pressure casing. A flurry in prices started and was carried upward by speculation in the commodity by tire manufacturers, rubber importers, and merchants and individual traders. Some of them went "long" and bought rubber futures for a rise, thus bidding up prices; others sold "short" and were later forced to repurchase and cover their contracts at heavy losses, causing the failure of numerous concerns.

In conclusion, to my mind the only remedy for the United States is to grow its own rubber. When England found itself under the domination of American cotton planters she grew cotton in Egypt. So we must grow rubber in the Philippines, in Liberia, Panama, and so forth.

We can not expect to find a remedy by any unnatural interference with the economic law of supply and demand. We must banish from our minds that any pool or combination or "control" will solve this problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON].

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the experience of our people in the last few years with regard to the prices they have been obliged to pay for the commodities mentioned in this bill, purchased from foreign producers, is the most forceful argument for this kind of legislation. I call attention briefly to the interest that we in the Middle West, from the agricultural section of our country, have in this measure. The farmer is a large consumer of all of the commodities mentioned in this bill, and especially so of rubber and twine. Sisal is included, and any slight increase in the price of sisal means an increase in the price of twine which the farmer must buy from year to year in harvesting his crops. When we learn from evidence produced at the hearings that an increase of 1 cent a pound in raw rubber means a total of $9,000,000 to the American people annually, and that a slight increase in the price of sisal also means a very large additional outlay, that indicates clearly the necessity for this sort of legislation.

So far as the question of monopoly is concerned, no one wishes to permit the organization of monopolies that would enhance the price to the consumer of these commodities, but that danger, to my mind, is very clearly safeguarded in the bill. The authorities have complete supervision over these organizations, and therefore the law can not be used to enhance the price to the consumer. On the contrary, a measure of this kind will be of great benefit and a saving to the consumer. The matter is clearly safeguarded, and, as has been said by the Secretary of Commerce, if this law is placed on the statute books, the probability is we will never have to resort to it. It has been argued here to-day that because these commodities are now down in price to what may be said to be reasonable, that there is no further necessity for this sort of legislation. This is just the time when we should prepare for future emergencies, and we should remember the well-known phrase so often uttered, that in time of peace we should prepare for war. This is just the time that we ought to place on our statute books a law which will prevent the undue exactions that the American people have had to meet in the past.

And so, let us give our approval to this measure. Let us place it on our statute books; and then, if the prices on these foreign commodities which we must purchase from time to time in great quantity remain at a reasonable figure, the Secretary of Commerce will never have occasion to license any of these organizations; but if in the future foreign combinations and monopolies seek to exact from us undue prices upon commodities, our Secretary of Commerce will then have this remedy in his hand and will invoke it and thus prevent unreasonable exactions from us because of combinations in foreign countries. If the situation should not arise, the statute would remain as an assurance against undue exactions in the future. Let us have this statute as a safeguard against the kind of exactions to which the American people have been subjected in the years gone by. I am in favor of this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Who is the instigator of this bill, the originator of the idea?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I do not know. It has come to us, like many other measures, to remedy conditions which confront us.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The General Motors have had something to do with it.

Mr. DYER. This matter originated, as the gentleman knows, a few years ago, upon the investigation of the rubber situation. The matter has been presented to this House by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. When there is an increase in the price of the raw commodities mentioned herein, such increase is passed on to the consumer, who, I feel, is more interested in this bill than the manufacturer.

Mr. NEWTON. The original resolution was offered by our floor leader, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not this bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has 1 hour and 6 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri 1 hour and 7 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am going to read now from the hearings had before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee upon the Tilson resolution, and the speaker is Mr. Hoover. I read:

> It has been suggested that our industries should themselves collectively bargain to establish fair prices.
>
> This also raises grave questions as to whether we wish these controls to become fixed in international life, and probably involves also Government supervision of their bargains. Alternatively, it has been suggested that we might set up such combinations in our own country over materials which we control, either singly or jointly, with one or two other major producers, thus getting our share of the profits in this game. Any such policy would not only involve us in a thousand frictions in international relations, but we would have done injustice to others.
> In my own mind I reject all these suggestions.

That is Mr. Hoover before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a short while ago. Here is Mr. Hoover on this bill. I read:

> I am glad to lend the support of the views of the department and myself to those put forward by the agricultural associations and the manufacturers to the principles of the bill.

Before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce he was against it. Now, because the agricultural associations want it, he is for it.

Papers of the rubber traders have been against artificial regulation of rubber prices. I will insert some of these statements in the RECORD:

DIVORCING GOVERNMENT FROM BUSINESS

[From the India Rubber World]

Less government in business, forestalling meddlesome legislation, freedom from interfering commissions, decreasing dependence upon courts, and the removal of common causes of litigation are the outstanding advantages now accruing to industry through the setting up of standards of production, materials, manufacturing, and merchandising methods by over 250 national organizations. Business is learning at last how to police itself, instead of referring to others manifestly incapable of settling technical disputes or mooted questions between buyers and sellers or shop owners and employees.

No one appreciates the movement to have industry settle its own affairs without recourse to the courts more than the progressive jurist. None better than he realizes the folly of costly lawsuits hinging, for instance, on the interpretation of such loose phrases as "all material shall be of the best commercial quality" and "good workmanship shall be required throughout." But when industry establishes definite codes and precise criteria covering all conditions that may occasion debate, courts will have small patience with terms so vague; and more likely than not many a future action will be decided not so much on hypotheses and technicalities as upon proofs adduced as to whether standard practice with the force and virtue of the law of the land was fairly upheld or willfully ignored.

The rubber industry has had more than its share of unnecessary legislation and litigation. To its credit it can be said that it has done a great deal toward improving conditions, especially in promoting standardization and simplification and effecting more efficient distribution; but much yet remains to be done before the goal can be reached where industrial agencies will supersede courts and legislatures in solving industrial problems. In the tire field alone, if standardization is to be secured and economical production furthered, it is necessary for automobile manufacturers to give the tire manufacturers much more cooperation in determining specifications, methods of test, nomenclature, and dimensions of tire equipment.

Here is the statement of Colonel Donovan, of the Department of Justice, speaking at a dinner of the Rubber Association in New York this year. I read:

Now, there are those to-day—some who advocate a modification of our antitrust law. Too often those who advocate that modification have no appreciation of what the modification should be, no understanding of the manner in which it should be brought about, and no recognition of the consequences which would flow. Men of affairs and economists tell us that we are right in the midst of an economic transition. If that be true, then it is the worst time in which to have legislation, because if you have legislation before you know where your tendency is going to take you, trouble is bound to result.

Some time ago President Coolidge pointed out that our prosperity is not due to regulation; that it has been based upon the principle that human welfare can best be preserved by insisting upon personal initiative rather than by resorting to governmental regulation and participation.

There is Colonel Donovan, of the Department of Justice, the man who has charge of just such situations as this, speaking to the Rubber Association against legislation of this kind.

Then President Francis R. Henderson, of the New York Rubber Exchange, speaking in February of this year, said:

The new year has, so far, indicated that we are approaching a freer market for the world's rubber. I mean by this that there is every indication that we will soon return to a market dominated by economic laws rather than by Government regulations.

Here are the trade papers speaking about the possibilities of the restriction being upon us, speaking of the possibilities of the rubber supply, all indicating a lower price on crude rubber:

[From the India Rubber and Tire Review]

The 1928 consumption will not exceed production—stocks in February in United States, 110,000 tons; London, 70,000 tons.

United States will only use 390,000 tons.

World's production will be 600,000 tons.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] referred to this chart, showing a peak price of $1.20. There were not 50 tons of rubber sold on that day at that price.

Here the pool is pegging the price of 42 cents a pound, bringing it above normal. It is said that they have lost money, but they have not cut prices in 1927 on tires. They are going to make up on tire prices what apparently they lose in marketing crude rubber.

Since the end of December last crude rubber has declined from about 42 cents to around 22½ cents a pound, approximately 46 per cent. This drop in the commodity has led to belief that tire prices would inevitably be cut, and that rubber companies would suffer accordingly.

The consensus in the industry, however, seems to be that tire prices will not be cut during the first half of the year.

What happened here when the British restrictions went into effect? Our manufacturers wanted the British manufacturers to sell more cheaply, and with the workmen of the East to work for less money, and they refused to buy. The speculators with foresight bought the rubber and gouged the manufacturers. That is the cause of the increased price. In 1926 after Hoover's protest the average price was higher than in 1925. In 1925 the rubber manufacturers made more money than they ever made, but the laborers in the rubber-tire plants got no increase in their wages. The average price of rubber in 1925 was 48.36 cents a pound and in 1926, after the Tilson resolution, the average was 54.63 cents a pound and in 1926 there was about 17,000 more tons imported.

The rubber manufacturers have made enormous sums since restriction.

E. G. Holt gives the following table of dividends in rubber companies in first year of restriction and in 1925:

Over here on this chart we have $297,000,000 given as what the British rubber planters got through profits by restriction. That is not so. That is what the British rubber planters got for their rubber in 1925. Mr. Hoover stated before the Interstate Commerce Committee that the British rubber planters in 1925 got $650,000,000. That was not so, because his own department's report for that year indicated that all the rubber brought over only came to $429,000,000. It seems to me that the great god Hoover, like the god Achilles, has a weak heel—a rubber heel.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. No; I have no time to yield. Unlike rubber, I am unyielding. Here is a great American tire plant which stands behind our tariff wall of 10 per cent on tires but does not like the English tariff of 33⅓ per cent on tires. So this great and patriotic rubber plant, whose flag is the long green, studded with dollar signs, went to Great Britain and put up a plant over there, and here is what they say to the British, this being an American firm in the Rubber Age for August, 1927:

It is the intention of the company to purchase, as far as possible, all the equipment and requirements of the factory from British manufacturers and to make the company a truly British one, employing as much British labor as possible.

Those are the fellows who are protesting against this British monopoly, yet they go over there to take advantage of it. We got rid of one monopoly by good sense by British planters, and the British gave in to natural economic laws. However, in this country we want to create another monopoly, because some people are never satisfied unless some kind of a monopoly is gouging them, particularly an American. In 1925 the value of the rubber production in this country was $1,225,000,000.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. No. The rubber workers got $1,090,000. The value of the rubber production here was over a billion dollars while the workers in the rubber factories got $1,090,000. That was 31 per cent of the value of production over the year 1923. They increased the production value by 31 per cent, but did they increase what the laborers got? They did increase it $8,000,000, but that was for the purpose of taking care of 4,000 more laborers.

[From the Rubber Age—July 10, 1927]

1925 CENSUS REVEALS RUBBER-TRADE GROWTH—FINAL REPORT OF CENSUS BUREAU SHOWS JUMP OF 31 PER CENT IN RUBBER INDUSTRY OVER 1923—PRODUCTS VALUED OVER $1,000,000,000—498 PLANTS IN UNITED STATES

The final report of the Bureau of the Census covering a summary of all rubber manufacturers and their products in the United States in 1925 has just been issued.

From the present report it appears that the wholesale value of rubber products in 1925 totaled $1,255,414,112, or an increase of 31 per cent over the value of products manufactured in 1923, and an increase of 317 per cent over products manufactured in 1914. The census of 1925 covers 498 rubber factories employing 141,121 workers whose total wages amounted to $190,562,920. This compares with the census of 1923 when 529 factories were listed, employing 137,868 workmen whose total wages were $182,084,056.

I am glad to see that the distinguished Speaker of the House has just come in, because Mr. Hoover has been claiming a lot of credit for the great interest in this rubber proposition. Now, away back when it started the man who really called attention to it, if there is any credit to be given for it, was the distinguished Speaker of this House. Hoover came along a little late, when he got ideas of being President and when he became anti-British, but the Speaker of the House saw the thing away in advance of the distinguished gentleman now in the Department of Commerce. [Applause.]

We have had gouging American rubber pools before. The first was known as the New York Trading Co.:

[From the India Rubber World, October 1, 1922]

In 1880 several of the larger rubber-goods manufacturers formed the New York Trading Co. to buy and sell crude rubber. The capital was $100,000, yet, within a period of five years, $1,000,000 was paid in dividends. During that time no one outside the group controlling this close corporation scarcely knew of its existence. Each of the member firms bought and sold rubber supposedly for its own account, but actually for the account of the New York Trading Co. In this way it was able to hold a remarkable control over market prices. That combination "in restraint of trade" was perhaps the nearest approach to monopoly that has ever been experienced in the rubber trade and it certainly exercised a control over a longer period than any individual or corporation has ever been able to effect. Such a condition would scarcely be possible at the present time because of the legislation, even though such purchasers were bona fide buyers and not speculators.

There is no necessity for this thing, whether the British remove the restrictions or not. American interests control 200,000 acres in the East, and I quote this from the India Rubber World of January 1, 1928:

It is confidently predicted that within but a few years American interests will control sufficient production to preclude the chance of either rubber shortage or adverse price regulations.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLACK of New York. No; I can not yield. This is from the Indian Rubber World of February, 1928:

Countries not under British flag produced one-third rubber in 1922 but will produce over one-half in 1928.

The United States used 63.8 of the world's rubber in 1927, and we will use 63.5 in 1928. Non-British rubber in 1928 will be over 50 per cent of world's rubber. We had 110,000 tons on hand in January, which would take care of one-fourth of our requirements.

And that is what has happened to the British rubber monopoly. The Dutch have come in and have taken away their market. Another thing that has happened to them is that the planters made so much money that they were able to invest in other plantations and increase their supply of rubber. The British in 1927 got $300,000,000 less for their exports than they did in 1926, although they exported 60,000 more tons in 1927 than in 1926. The American crude rubber bill in 1927 was $166,000,000 less than in 1926, but the imports were 13,400,000 tons greater.

The Times Trade and Engineering Supplement (London, February 11), commenting on the announcement, states:

This means that the failure of the restriction scheme is now officially recognized. * * * The scheme failed solely because it ignored the fact that rubber is not a British monopoly and that any reduction in the British output might be offset by increased foreign output."

The Economist (London, February 11) welcomes the inquiry with the following statement:

"Various changes have been made [in the scheme] from time to time, but the general effect has been to stereotype British production at a level which, taken over the five years of the scheme's existence, shows little change from that of the years 1920 to 1922, an increase in world demand over the same period of about 55 per cent having been taken up by increased output on the part of producers outside the Empire. As the British Empire last year produced only 49½ per cent of the world's rubber, as compared with an average of 72 per cent in 1920–1922, the maintenance of restriction in an effective form has tended to entail growing hardship on many producers, and as recently as the last three months numerous estates in Malaya have suffered curtailments of their assessments averaging from 15 to 20 per cent."

The London Statist (February 11) says:

"There can be no doubt that those responsible for the reenactment of restriction on present lines have brought about a most difficult situation, and one from which it will not be easy to extricate the British plantation industry. This, apparently, has now been realized by the Government, and an announcement has been made this week upon which it is scarcely necessary to comment. Into it can only be read a growing uneasiness on the part of the Government regarding the working of restriction."

The Government announcement also excited the Malayan press to make strong pertinent comments.

The Straits Times, always a stalwart champion of restriction, advises calmness, declaring that if restriction goes, it will be a comfortably long time dying.

The Singapore Free Press expresses the hope that the committee will not report too hastily, and is pessimistic as to the possibility of reaching any agreement with the Dutch.

The antirestrictionist viewpoint is supported by the Penang Gazette, which argues that the producing industry retains sufficient vitality to rehabilitate itself in open competition. It suggests that it were better that a number of weak plantations failed now rather than that a continuance of the present economic policy eventually dragged down the weak and the strong together.

In Ceylon it is reported that a motion introduced in the Ceylon Legislature recommends to the government the urgent desirability of acceding to the general opinion of local rubber interests in removing the rubber restriction measures.

There is another thing about it that the distinguished statistician of the Republican Party, Mr. Newton, overlooked and that is this, that the cost of crude rubber has been less than the cost of raw materials used in practically every other line of manufacture. That has been demonstrated by the charts prepared by the rubber exchange. The rubber curve is much lower all the way through than the curve of other crude costs. The rubber industry paid 72.99 for its materials in 1925 as against 73.05 paid by other industries. The rubber companies' profits were 8.98 as against 6.74 for other industries.

Now, it is very plain to me that this pool is either legal or illegal. If it is illegal we are only the legislative branch of the Government. We do not run grand juries and we do not make indictments or anything like that. If it is illegal this question does not belong here; it belongs somewhere else. If it is illegal we should not be called upon to give these gentleman a legislative immunity bath.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, announcement was made yesterday by the British Prime Minister in the House of Commons that the British rubber monopoly would be brought to an end on November 1 next. I consider this an event of great importance in world trade. In considering this proposition I think honor ought to be given where honor is due. It seems to me that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK], who has just taken his seat, has strained a point in trying to discredit the Secretary of Commerce for what he has done in this matter. On the contrary, I think the Secretary of Commerce is due the thanks and gratitude of the people of the entire country and of the world for what he has done. [Applause.]

You will recall that in January, 1923, Secretary Hoover in strong terms called public attention to the growing action of various foreign governments creating by legislation monopolies in raw materials upon which we in the United States were dependent by imports. You will recollect that he unceasingly brought this matter before the American and world public as not only a drive against the American consumer but as a world danger. At that time these government monopolies had been created in eight or nine important commodities and prices were being lifted against the American consumer. Several other such commodities were under consideration for similar organization.

The rubber monopoly became the most successful of these attempts to hold up artificial prices against the consumers of the world, more particularly ourselves since we consume 75 per cent of the rubber of the world, and prices advanced from 36 cents a pound, which was announced by the monopoly as a fair price, to as high as $1.21 a pound.

After conferring with Mr. Hoover as to what the situation was and what might be done, I introduced a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That great committee, through a series of public hearings, gave material assistance to the organization set up by Secretary Hoover to combat this situation. It was a serious situation, because we import 900,000,000 pounds of rubber annually, and this excessive price meant a drain on our consumers of $600,000,000 a year even over and above the so-called fair price. As a matter of fact, at the so-called fair price we would have paid approximately $300,000,000 for our annual rubber supply, whereas we actually did pay $508,000,000 in 1926—a total of nearly $300,000,000 in excess of the fair price, and even the fair price was high enough to give an assured profit to the grower.

The campaign organized against rubber monopolies by which the American consumer and manufacturer joined in conservation and the use of substitutes, relieved this situation and the price soon fell to 40 cents per pound, and to-day there is an abundance of rubber at 25 cents a pound or less.

This action was of more widespread importance than even the immediate great savings to our farmers, our workmen, and our public, who are now realizing a reduction of nearly 40 per cent in the cost of their automobile tires. The example in the case of rubber has served as a solemn warning against the formation of new organizations of this kind. Bureaucratic price-fixing devices have proved a failure even under most favorable conditions. It should be a warning against all attempts to set up such activities in the future.

The world discussion which was brought out as the result of the resistance initiated by Secretary Hoover to the activities of the rubber control had material influence on the resolutions of the International Economic Conference in Geneva last May by which the members of that conference unanimously expressed their sentiments against such organizations. As I said at the outset, the consumers of the United States and of the world at large owe Secretary Hoover a debt of gratitude for the resolute leadership he took in the fight to free international trade from one of the most threatening devices.

In considering the resolution introduced by me the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House held extended and illuminating hearings, and finally, through the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], who has discussed the question this afternoon, submitted a report, giving a great deal of very valuable information.

The effect of the hearings and of the entire attack upon the rubber combination was that the price of rubber was very materially reduced. The people in this country who use rubber were being mulcted, I might say, or at least they were being compelled to pay many hundreds of millions of dollars beyond a fair price. As a direct result of the efforts of Mr. Hoover and others in connection with the matter, the price was brought down to what may be considered and has been admitted to be a fair price. The charts exhibited here tell the story.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for one brief question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman tell the members of the committee what effect the use of balloon tires had upon the demand for rubber?

Mr. TILSON. I presume that if it took a little more rubber to manufacture balloon tires this would naturally increase the demand and would have a tendency to increase the price.

Mr. CELLER. Is not that one of the reasons for the abrupt rise in price as shown on that chart?

Mr. TILSON. I could not accept that statement entirely. Other elements entered into it.

Mr. COHEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. COHEN. Is it not the fact that balloon tires ran two or three times as long as the smaller tires?

Mr. TILSON. The statement of the gentleman from New York is probably correct.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In view of the good work that the Secretary of Commerce has done, does not the distinguished leader think the best thing to do is to just let this situation rest like it is?

Mr. TILSON. No. Whether this importing combination may or may not be doing an illegal thing, I believe, in view of what has happened, there should be a legal method by which the attack on such foreign combines can be carried further if necessary.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This announcement about November 1, of course, is good in prospect, but we will not be in session in November.

Mr. TILSON. And we do not know who may be Prime Minister of England at that time or whether the announcement as to November 1 will go into effect. If it is done and the combination is done away with, no harm whatever will have been done by the passage of this bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And the Congress will not be in session in November.

Mr. TILSON. No; our Congress will probably not meet until December, so that in view of all these facts, it seems to me this bill ought to be passed so that we may have this weapon in hand ready for use. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LUCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8927) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918, had come to no resolution thereon.

M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, an examination of the RECORD discloses that the permission granted to file minority views was personal to two members of the committee and was with respect to the bill H. R. 7940, which has been reintroduced as H. R. 12687. I now ask unanimous consent that any member of the minority on the committee may be granted five legislative days within which to file minority views on the bill H. R. 12687.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

MINORITY VIEWS ON H. R. 11411

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that as a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining I may have five legislative days within which to file minority views on the bill H. R. 11411.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

FLOOD LEGISLATION

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the flood control bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House. Since the bill known as the Jones flood control bill passed the Senate I have received a number of letters and telegrams urging me to support the measure. I heard from the Governor of Missouri, other public officials, and business men. The letters indicate there is some doubt in the minds of some people as to the attitude of members of the Missouri delegation in the House on flood-control legislation. Why such a doubt should exist, if it does exist, is beyond me to comprehend. I made inquiry of other members of the Missouri delegation and am informed they too received numerous letters along this line.

The Missouri delegation, both in the House and Senate, has been active since the flood in its demand for adequate legislation of this character. Senator HAWES, as a member of the Commerce Committee of the Senate, assumed a prominent part in framing the amended Jones bill. Senator JAMES A. REED made every effort to convince the President an extra session of Congress should be called last spring and from that time on has urged the passage of a real flood control bill.

As to the Members of the Missouri delegation, all have anxiously awaited an opportunity to vote on the subject, and it is my opinion the bill will receive the support of the 16 Members from my State on the final roll call. I do not know of a Member who is opposed to the bill.

Naturally, I want to see the best bill that can be passed sent to the President. When the Jones bill came from the Senate, I suggested it would be well if the measure was taken from the Speaker's table and passed, but others insisted the committee desired to consider proposed amendments which would make it more liberal.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NELSON], who is a member of the Flood Control Committee, said there was room for improvement. He is well informed on the subject and devoted months of his time, night and day, assisting to work out a bill that would accomplish the desired results. The House committee is to be commended because it has reported the Jones bill with amendments, which makes it a much improved measure than the one that passed the Senate.

The President comes in at the eleventh hour and asks for further amendments. I sincerely hope the committee will make such changes as will satisfy the President and the Rules Committee will bring in a rule which will enable the House to consider the bill next week. We have waited nearly a year, and there should be no further delay.

While the high water did not cause any damage to my home city, St. Louis, we are to-day affected by the flood, because our merchants have lost a market of millions of people. Our factories are feeling the loss of the purchasing power of the people of the Mississippi Valley.

As I told the Flood Control Committee months ago, the people of St. Louis want to see a bill passed which will provide improvements that will prevent a recurrence of this great disaster. Further, they are demanding that the Federal Government shoulder the entire financial obligations, as they know full well the people of the valley have no funds to meet any portion of the cost.

There should be one responsibility, as the report of the House committee suggests, and I have always contended that the responsibility rests with the Government.

I heard the distinguished Speaker of the House say at the flood-control conference in Chicago that he was anxious to see two bills passed as soon as Congress convened. One was a flood control bill and the other awarding the Congressional Medal of Honor to Col. Charles Lindbergh. When Congress convened I introduced a bill now Public law No. 1, of the Seventieth Congress, awarding the Congressional Medal of Honor to Colonel Lindbergh. I hope within a few days to cast my vote for and see a bill passed that will complete the Speaker's program, as announced at Chicago last summer, and my only regret is that the flood control bill was not passed early in December so it could have been recognized as Public law No. 2, of the Seventieth Congress.

I will add as part of my remarks a copy of a letter I have written to the Governor of the State of Missouri. The letter follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 5, 1928.

Hon. SAM A. BAKER,
Governor, Jefferson City, Mo.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I was mighty pleased to receive your letter of the 28th, acknowledged a few days ago. Since answering your communication I have become convinced from the tone of your letter, as well as a number of others I have since received on the same subject, that some one has sent a circular communication to the State which would tend to convey the impression that Members of Congress from Missouri, including myself, were not in favor of adequate flood legislation.

Speaking for myself, I want to say that since last spring no Member of Congress has been more active in trying to secure not only an adequate flood protection law but also a bill granting some relief to the stricken people of the Mississippi Valley.

Immediately after the flood I sent three telegrams to the President, urging an extra session of Congress so that flood legislation could be passed and the money taken from the $600,000,000 surplus which existed at the time, but which, on July 1, was used toward the reduction of the public debt.

I attended the flood conference in Chicago and made every effort to start a movement to demand that the conference include in the resolutions adopted a request for an extra session of Congress. In that I found in the end I had the support of three men, Representative BYRNS, of Tennessee; Representative RAINEY, of Illinois; and Representative ASWELL, of Louisiana.

Most everyone else who attended that conference with whom I came in contact seemed to confine their efforts to making complimentary speeches in reference to the various public officials who were taking part in the conference and who had been active in reference to flood relief. Frankly, I will say the conference reminded me of a meeting of a mutual admiration society and if it accomplished anything I have been unable up to this time to discover it.

While the Jones bill might be satisfactory to the Senate, it is not entirely satisfactory to me, but if in the end we can not secure better legislation, which would be of more benefit to the people of the Mississippi Valley, I will support the Jones bill.

However, the House committee, which has been in session since last November, and before which I appeared in behalf of this legislation, on Saturday reported the Jones bill, with certain amendments, and it is my purpose to support these amendments and not try and pass the bill as it was approved by the Senate.

The amended bill is a much better measure for the State of Missouri and other States in the valley than the one which passed the Senate. Under the terms of the Jones bill the civil engineers on the commission could be appointed from the Army, but the House bill provides that they must be selected from civilian life. The amended bill further definitely provides for tributaries. It also creates a $5,000,000 emergency fund to be used anywhere and at any time, as well as a provision for investigations and additional money for surveys.

Congressman WILLIAM L. NELSON, who represents the eighth district, which includes Jefferson City, is the Missouri member of the Flood Control Committee of the House, and is to be commended for his work in connection with the amended bill. I have cooperated with him and will continue to do so. Flood-control legislation has no more sincere friend in Congress than Mr. NELSON.

I write at length because I desire you and others to know my attitude toward flood legislation, and I might also add that every Member of the House from Missouri has, like myself, anxiously awaited an opportunity to support a bill which would provide for adequate flood protection.

With kind regards, sincerely yours,

JOHN J. COCHRAN.

THE LATE SENATOR ANDRIEUS A. JONES

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of an order, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of an order, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 15th of April, 1928, following the memorial services for Hon. WALTER W. MCGEE, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. ANDRIEUS A. JONES, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

The order was agreed to.

PATENT RIGHTS AT MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on patent rights issued by the Patent Office.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, some Members of Congress, and some persons not members of Congress but interested in the general subject of development at Muscle Shoals, have expressed some concern about the constitutionality of the provisions of section 19 of the bill proposed by the Military Affairs Committee as a substitute for the Norris bill, which passed the Senate.

I now propose to show very conclusively, I submit, that the provisions of section 19, relating to patent rights, is not only in harmony with existing law but is in several respects more liberal and therefore more favorable to the holders of patent rights than the general law itself. Prior to the passage of the act of June 25, 1910, which bestowed upon the holder of a patent a right of action in the Court of Claims against the Government for the use by the Government of any patent issued by the Patent Office of the United States, a patentee was wholly without remedy. The Court of Claims could not entertain jurisdiction of an action for compensation unless the action was based on contract. The court of equity could not restrain by injunction the use by the Government of the patent, because the sovereign can not be sued and enjoined except in cases where the sovereign has expressly consented by statute to be sued. Hence, the result was that patentees were completely at the mercy of the Government in case the Government saw fit to use any patent device, process, or formula in regard to which a patent might have been issued out of the Patent Office. The general law is correctly stated at page 818 of 30 Cyc., as follows:

* Right of Government to use invention: Although the consent of the owner of a patented device is not positively necessary in order to enable the United States Government to use the invention described in the letters patent, particularly in cases where it relates to the mode of construction of implements of warfare needed by the Government, it has no right to use a patented invention without compensation to the patentee. When it grants letters patent for a new invention or discovery in the arts, it confers upon the patentee an exclusive property in the patented invention which can not be appropriated or used by the Government itself, without just compensation, any more than it can appropriate or use without compensation land which has been patented to a private purchaser. Nevertheless, no injunction can be obtained against the Government or against an official acting for the Government unless expressly permitted by act of Congress, nor can suit be maintained against the Government for damages for the infringement. It is not liable to suits founded in tort. While compensation can be obtained by suit on an express or implied contract, this is the only method by which it may be obtained.

The Constitution of the United States does not confer any patent rights, but only gives Congress the power to encourage the useful arts and sciences by guaranteeing to authors and inventors the exclusive use of their respective writings or inventions for a limited time. In the exercise of this power Congress has seen fit to confer this right of exclusive use under certain conditions and restrictions and limitations. It can not be denied that the sovereign which confers a right to a subject or to a citizen, may confer that right subject to conditions and limitations. A patent right is not a natural right such as is the right of life, liberty, or the pursuit of happiness. In fact a patent right does not stand in the same category as the right of ownership and possession to real estate or to tangible personal property, such as the products of the farm grown upon real estate. A patent right is a right created by statute, and while it is an absolute safe and secure right as against all citizens, no power in the Nation can restrain the strong arm of the Government itself in its power and right to use for itself the benefits of any patent that may have been issued by it.

PATENT OFFICE OPEN TO PUBLIC

The Patent Office contains no secrets, except as to pending applications for patents. Patents which have been issued are subject to public inspection. If any citizen sends to the Commissioner of Patents a small fee of 10 cents, he may receive a descriptive copy of any patent that has ever been issued by the Patent Office. The benefit of the patent consists in protecting to the patentee the right of use for himself or of use for those and in those to whom the patentee may have assigned, in whole or in part, his exclusive rights. Hence, if any citizen can go to the Patent Office and see all of the records there, surely the Government, of which the Patent Office is a part, has access to all the information therein contained. Since the Government is not restrained in its use of information which it may possess, then the Government may use any patent and the Government out of a sense of justice and fairness gives to any patentee the right to bring an action in the Court of Claims for compensation on account of the use of such patent.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

The law as it stood prior to the act of June 25, 1910, is correctly stated and in comprehensive manner in the opinion of Mr. Justice Gray in the case of Belknap v. Schild (161 U. S. 10; 40 Lawyers' Ed. 599).

The case of Crozier v. Krupp (224 U. S. 290; 56 Lawyers' Ed. 771) was decided April 8, 1912, and the unanimous opinion of the court was rendered by Chief Justice White holding that under the act of June 25, 1910, the sole and exclusive remedy of a patentee whose patent was used by the Government is an action in the Court of Claims for compensation. The following language of the court is quoted to illustrate that the Supreme Court of the United States indorsed the general views heretofore announced.

In other words, the situation prior to the passage of the act of 1910 was this: Where it was asserted that an officer of the Government had infringed a patent right belonging to another—in other words, had taken his property for the benefit of the Government—the power to sue the United States for redress did not obtain unless, from the proof, it was established that a contract to pay could be implied; that is to say, that no right of action existed against the United States for a mere act of wrongdoing by its officers. Evidently inspired by the injustice of this rule as applied to rights of the character of those embraced by patents, because of the frequent possibility of their infringement by the acts of officers under circumstances which would not justify the implication of a contract, the intention of the statute to create a remedy for this condition is illustrated by the declaration in the title that the statute was enacted "to provide additional protection for owners of patents." To secure this end, in comprehensive terms the statute provides that whenever an invention described in and covered by a patent of the United States "shall hereafter be used by the United States without license of the owner thereof or lawful right to use the same, such owner may recover reasonable compensation for such use by suit in the Court of Claims." That is to say, it adds to the right to sue the United States in the Court of Claims already conferred when contract relations exist, the right to sue even although no element of contract is present.

And to render the power thus conferred efficacious the statute endows any owner of a patent with the right to establish contradictorily with the United States the truth of his belief that his rights have been, in whole or in part, appropriated by an officer of the United States; and if he does so establish such appropriation, that the United States shall be considered as having ratified the act of the officer and be treated as responsible pecuniarily for the consequences. These results of the statute are the obvious consequences of the power which it confers upon the patentee to seek redress in the Court of Claims for any injury which he asserts may have been inflicted upon him by the unwarranted use of his patented invention and the nature and character of the defenses which the statute prescribes may be made by the United States to such an action when brought. The adoption by the United States of the wrongful act of an officer is, of course, an adoption of the act when and as committed and causes such act of the officer to be, in virtue of the statute, a rightful appropriation by the Government, for which compensation is provided. In substance, therefore, in this case, in view of the public nature of the subjects with which the patents in question are concerned and the undoubted authority of the United States as to such subjects to exert the power of eminent domain, the statute, looking at the substance of things, provides for the appropriation of a license to use the inventions, the appropriation thus made being sanctioned by the means of compensation for which the statute provides.

In the case of United States v. Farnham (240 U. S. 538, 60 Lawyers' Ed. 786) the court is again considering the general subject under review and reaffirmed the case of Crozier v. Krupp (224 U. S. 290) and a number of other cases cited and established beyond controversy the propositions herein announced.

THE WAR POWER

Making application of the doctrines of the United States Supreme Court to section 19 of the pending bill, it will be observed that the Muscle Shoals corporation is declared to be an instrumentality and agency of the Government for the purpose of executing its constitutional powers. What constitutional powers are sought to be exerted by the bill? First and foremost and manifestly, the war power is invoked. The war power is ever present and at all places.

It is not merely a power that exists in time of war but it exists in time of peace to be ready for war, if war be inevitable. In fact, it may be equally, if not more important, that the Government, through Congress, should have the power to exert the war power before the actual declaration of war than after such declaration. It might be too late to establish arsenals, munition plants, navy yards after war is declared. The act of June 3, 1916, giving to the President power to establish the project at Muscle Shoals was prior to any declaration of war. This Nation was no more involved in war on June 3, 1916, than it now is. It is indispensable as a part of the national defense program that the Government should be at all times in command of an adequate supply of nitrates with which to make explosives. These nitrates enter into gunpowder and into every other explosive charge. Without these explosives, rifles and cannons and bombs would be playthings; without these explosives armies and fleets would be useless; without these explosives airplanes and battleships and armored cruisers and submarines would be worse than idle toys. Hence Congress proclaims, as proposed by section 19, that in the operation of the Government properties at Muscle Shoals it is exercising the war power.

Furthermore, Congress proclaims that in the project at Muscle Shoals it is exercising the right to regulate interstate commerce. It has been repeatedly declared that control of navigable streams, and the construction of navigation facilities, including dams and locks, are all incidental applications of the constitutional right to regulate interstate commerce. Since the corporation contemplated by the bill is proclaimed to be the agent and instrumentality of the Government, being the creature of the Government, being subject to be repealed at any time by the Government, it is in legal contemplation, the Government itself. It is more truly the Government than any Army officer, or any Navy officer, or any officer of the Department of Agriculture, or of the Interior Department, or of the Department of Commerce. Such officer is primarily a natural person and has an existence independent of that of the Government of the United States. But this corporation created to operate the Government properties at Muscle Shoals, to keep the Government prepared for war in its own defense, is declared to be created for the sole and express purpose of carrying out the constitutional powers of the Government to maintain itself ready to defend in war its very existence.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—EXPORT TRADE

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those who have spoken to-day on the bill and those who speak to-morrow may have leave to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill for five days after the conclusion of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all Members of the House who speak on the bill and others who may desire may have five legislative days to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I know of no bill that we have considered on the floor of this House for the past seven years that contained more concealed dynamite than this bill, H. R. 8927. It is understood that we now have a rubber combination or monopoly known as the American rubber pool, controlling the importation and price of rubber. It is my belief that this monopoly has been and is operating absolutely without regard to Federal laws. In its operations for the past few years those interested in and controlling this monopoly have been able to make millions at the expense of the independent manufacturers and consumers of rubber goods. I believe further that if the Federal Trade Commission and those who are intrusted with the enforcement of the Federal laws governing combinations and monopolies would perform their duties we would now have a number of these parties on their way to the Federal prison. This bill, as I see it, proposes to accomplish two or three things, first to legalize an illegal combination or monopoly now operating without conscience or any regard for the law; second, will place the combination in a position whereby they may be able to continue to speculate and manipulate without the fear of the interference of the law; third, to save their own skins inasmuch as they have been caught at their own game.

It is generally agreed that 30 cents is a fair price for rubber; to-day rubber is selling for about 21 cents or about 9 cents per pound below the fair price when the price of rubber was soaring from 21 cents to the peak price of $1.21 and even thereafter when the price commenced to decline we did not hear these big boys crying out for a legalized monopoly to help them whip a foreign combination. They were perfectly satisfied with the way they were playing the game and with the income of their millions at the expense of the consumers of rubber, but now because of several legitimate reasons, the price of rubber has declined far below their expectations, and they having been caught with about 65,000 tons of rubber at a price of around 40 cents per pound, they are very much disturbed about a foreign monopoly and the great American consuming public. Is it a fact, my friends, that they are seriously concerned about the fellow who has to buy automobile tires or are they concerned about having the Federal Government behind this great American combination and to have this monopoly legalized to do the very thing that this Government and the American people have been trying to regulate and control since the foundation of this Government?

Because of the speculation on the part of this American combination and because of the restriction under the Stevenson Act, prices were forced so high that it caused an overproduction of rubber and now that Mr. Firestone, Henry Ford, and others having planted millions of acres in rubber-producing trees that will soon be coming on the market, naturally, the price is coming down. Now, therefore, the cry goes up by certain Members of Congress who seem to be ready at all times to represent special interest at the expense of the great masses. "Give us a legalized American monopoly for certain American citizens so that they can use, if needs be, illegal methods in bucking a foreign monopoly for the benefit of our American consumers." Why the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] is bold to say that he is not concerned about or interested in this monopoly that he proposes to legalize under his bill but he is worried about the American consumer, especially the farmer. When has the gentleman from Minnesota become so interested in and sympathetic toward the farmer as to be able to stand upon the floor of this House and in his pleadings shed tears resembling the flow of the great Mississippi?

He has been an outstanding leader against all farm relief legislation which has been proposed in Congress for the last few years to put farmers in the control of their own business and on an equality with other industries. Gentlemen who are so concerned about the passage of their legislation and the consumers should be frank and fair in their statement. Some days ago the rubber pool put up about $60,000,000, getting ready to operate under the gentleman's bill. Immediately rubber advanced about 2 cents per pound, in the meantime the announcement was made that the restrictions now enforced to control the price of rubber in Great Britain would be withdrawn about November 1, and immediately the price of rubber declined. On April 5 the directors of the United States Rubber Co. failed to pay their usual quarterly dividend of $2 per share on their 8 per cent preferred stock due at this time, making a statement that the payment was deferred because of the losses on their stock of crude rubber on account of the decline in prices.

Inasmuch as rubber has declined from $1.21 to about 25 cents a pound, the proponents of this legislation should be prepared to insert in the RECORD a statement showing that this great American rubber monopoly has given the benefit of this tremendous decline to the consumers of rubber and rubber tires.

They have failed to do it and I believe that it will be impossible for them to do it. They have included in this bill potash and sisal, but, of course, this is a joke and is done for the purpose of securing the indorsement of farmers and votes for the bill. This part of the bill as stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is simply a window dressing. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] in his speech acknowledged the fact that we have an American Fertilizer Trust controlling and fixing the price of potash and nitrates in America. Yet, he is more interested in legalizing a similar combination to fix and control the price of rubber than he is in having these American combinations investigated and placed in Federal prison because of their highway robbery in manipulating and fixing prices, thereby robbing the American farmers. If these gentlemen are interested in the farmers of America they should be advocating legislation that would develop the potash beds of America and that would turn Muscle Shoals into a fertilizer plant in competition to these trusts that he speaks about and which would be in the interest of the farmer.

The gentleman from Minnesota speaks of the monopolistic control of the Chilean Government over the great acres of the nitrate beds in Chile, yet the Congress for the past 10 years has refused to turn Muscle Shoals into a fertilizer plant thereby forcing farmers to pay to the Chilean Government from $10 to $12 tax on every ton of nitrate imported from Chile, to say nothing of the extra freights. More than that, as stated by the gentleman from Maine, inasmuch as W. R. Grace & Co., du Pont, and about two other concerns, some of them being part owners of the Chilean nitrate beds, having a monopoly on the importation of practically all of the nitrates imported from Chile, they have been able to fix the price to the American farmer regardless of the Chilean Government.

Last July, 1927, the restrictions on competition on Chilean nitrates were removed, and nitrates that had been selling from $50 to $60 per ton prior to that time declined to $40 and $42 per ton f. o. b. Southern ports. Now that the fertilizer season is on, and farmers—my cotton farmers of the South—being at the mercy of these American combinations that you propose to legalize under this bill, have advanced the price to $48 and $55 per ton to farmers.

Farmers in the South are compelled to buy Chilean nitrates through the agents representing these American monopolies, regardless of the price, because it is the only successful weapon that we have to combat the cotton-boll weevil in the South; yet when we proposed legislation last fall to place the cotton farmer in a position whereby he would be able to take off the surplus, when blessed with one that always fixes the price on the whole crop and usually at a price below the cost of production, the gentleman from Minnesota, and practically every man favoring this legislation, raised a rough-house and voted against the farmers' surplus control bill.

It is useless at this time to speak of the helpless and hopeless condition of the American farmer, his helpless and hopeless condition is an open book to every Member of this Congress.

Within the next few days we hope to bring on the floor of this House a farm relief bill, and I expect to watch with a great deal of interest the maneuvers and the votes cast on this legislation by the proponents of this bill who are crying now in mournful tones for the American consumer and farmer.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the District of Columbia, with Senate amendments, disagree to the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska if there are any important matters in the Senate amendments except the amendment affecting the fiscal policy of the District?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; there are several important amendments. It carries considerably over a million dollars more than it carried when it passed the House.

Mr. SNELL. I do not want to instruct the conferees, but I feel that the House has gone on record several times on this matter of the fiscal policy, and if I understand the situation of the House now there is a large majority in favor of the existing policy of a contribution of $9,000,000. I wish the gentleman would not agree to change that policy unless he comes back to the House for a record vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no present intention of recommending any change in that policy.

Mr. SNELL. I wanted to mention it because I know the House has decided views along that line.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Reserving the right to object, let us get that statement a little bit more definite. As I understand, the gentleman agrees to bring back to the House an opportunity to vote affirmatively on the Senate amendment changing the $9,000,000 contribution to the 60-40 plan?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not making any agreement, and I do not think I should be asked to make one.

Mr. TILSON. I do not think the gentleman should be tied down to an agreement. He has given us assurance of his own views on the subject which will probably give the House an opportunity to vote on this proposition, but the conferees ought to have a full and free conference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Every member of the conference committee on the part of the House—that I suppose is going to be upon it—is precisely of the same mind.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I am glad to hear that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the District of Columbia appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. HOLADAY, and Mr. GRIFFIN.

SENATE

FRIDAY, April 6, 1928

Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., pastor of Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, gather our wandering minds and our wayward spirits into Thy secret place as this day the world bows at an uplifted cross, sublime symbol of song through sacrifice, gain through loss, peace through struggle, might through meekness, and life through death. May we walk in Thy light, think in Thy truth, and live in Thy spirit. Help us to be done with low aims and petty prejudices and false prides. May our horizons be stretched out as we walk the ascending way of adventuring faith and of steadfast purpose to do the right as Thou dost give us to see the right.

In the ministry of government may Thy servants here seek to know Thy holy will and to do it with courage and faithfulness amid the shadows and confusions of these days. Make us all pioneers of a redeemed humanity, citizens of that radiant kingdom of Thy love, wherein shall dwell justice and peace and righteousness, and in which the might of arrogance, narrow intolerance, and grasping greed shall be no more. For this sublime goal of the race may our Nation be the obedient servant of Thy great purposes.

"With peace that comes of purity
And strength to simple justice due,
So runs our loyal dream of Thee.
God of our fathers! Make it true."

We ask it through riches of grace in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to state that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] is necessarily detained on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

PEARL RIVER BRIDGES, MISSISSIPPI

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3118) to authorize the construction of a temporary railroad bridge across Pearl River at a point in or near section 35, township 10 north, range 6 east, Leake County, Miss., which was, on page 1, line 11, after the numerals "1906," to insert:

Provided, That if the bridge authorized by this act shall at any time be abandoned and no longer used for railroad purposes, the same shall be removed from the river by the Pearl River Valley Lumber Co., or its assigns, at its or their own expense.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3119) to authorize the construction of a temporary railroad bridge across Pearl River in Rankin County, Miss., and between Madison and Rankin Counties, Miss., which was, on page 2, line 3, after the numerals "1906," to insert:

Provided, That if the bridge authorized by this act shall at any time be abandoned and no longer used for railroad purposes, the same shall be removed from the river by the Pearl River Valley Lumber Co., or its assigns, at its or their own expense.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE CAPITOL GROUNDS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2301) to create a commission to be known as the commission for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds, and for other purposes, which were, on page 1, line 5, after the word "chairman," to insert "and ranking minority member"; on the same page, line 6, after the word "chairman," to insert "and ranking minority member"; on the same page, to strike out all after the word "commission" in line 11 down to and including the word "and" in line 3, page 2; on page 2, line 5, to strike out the word "both" and insert in lieu thereof "including"; and on the same page, after line 14, to insert:

SEC. 2. If the commission is unable to submit a final report before the expiration of the Seventieth Congress, those Members of the House of Representatives who are members of the commission at the date of expiration of such Congress, if Members elect to the succeeding Congress, shall continue as members of such commission until their successors are determined by the organization of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-first Congress.

Mr. KEYES. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to explain the amendments?

Mr. KEYES. The House has proposed five amendments. The first two add the ranking minority member of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the personnel of the commission. The third amendment changes one word. The fourth amendment provides for limiting the powers of the commission. The bill as it passed the Senate gives the commission control of the land between the Capitol and the Union Station, and the commission would not care to control the land after it had made its report to Congress recommending the improvements. The last amendment is one providing for a continuation of the Members of the House on the commission beyond the Seventieth Congress in case the commission should be unable to make a report before the expiration of the present Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendments of the House were concurred in.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PHIPPS. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. JONES, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate.

FARM RELIEF—PROPOSED UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if it be in order, I desire at this time to propose a unanimous-consent agreement with respect to the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A unanimous-consent agreement is always in order. The clerk will read the proposed agreement.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered (by unanimous consent), That on the calendar day of Tuesday, April 10, 1928, at not later than 5 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 3555, the so-called McNary-Haugen agricultural relief bill, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, would the Senator in charge of the bill be willing to change the proposed unanimous-consent agreement so that we may have time to consider any particular amendments which may be offered. When we disposed of the bill before, it will be remembered that some very vital amendments were offered without any opportunity to debate them. If we would limit debate to speeches of 10 minutes on each amendment or something of that kind, it would be more satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that under the rule the roll will have to be called to disclose the presence of a quorum before the agreement is submitted.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that he amend the proposed agreement so that it will not require a roll call. I suggest that he provide that debate be limited on the bill and all amendments to 10 minutes after the hour of 3 o'clock on Tuesday, making no reference to a final vote.

Mr. DILL. That is a proposal practically to close debate, and I think, therefore, that there ought to be a quorum present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think there is any necessity for the call of a quorum. According to my belief the bill can not be disposed of in a hurry; it is too important; it is too fundamental. I am not willing at this time to agree to limit the debate on Tuesday. I probably shall be willing to agree to it later in the day.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in view of the developments, which are entirely satisfactory, I will withhold the proposal for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate cablegrams from the president of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Representatives of the Porto Rican Legislature, tendering condolences on the death of the late Senator FRANK B. The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, Dupo Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Carondelet, Mo., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon Dupo Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Dupo Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Missouri or the State of Illinois, or any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 10 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the States or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 10 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 6. The Dupo Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the Highway Department of the States of Missouri and Illinois, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and upon request of the highway department of either of such States shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Dupo Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 4 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to Dupo Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSISTANTS TO GOVERNOR GENERAL OF PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 396, being the bill (S. 2292) providing for the employment of certain civilian assistants in the office of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, and fixing salaries of certain officials. I will say that this is a bill in which the late Senator from Ohio, Mr. Willis, was deeply interested, and the passage of which is urged aud requested by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I understand the rule, the unfinished business automatically comes before the Senate at 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut, if agreed to, will not interfere with the unfinished business.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope the motion which the Senator from Connecticut has just stated, if he shall insist upon it, will be——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable during the morning hour.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that he withhold the motion for the present. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is very much interested in the bill to which the Senator from Connecticut has referred, and he had, or thought he had, an understanding about the time when the bill would be taken up. He is compelled to leave the city in a few minutes on the business of the Senate. I myself should also like to have an opportunity to look into the provisions of the bill, and I think that no wholesome end would be accomplished by proceeding now with its consideration. It had not been anticipated that an effort would be made to consider the bill at this time. There are a number of Senators who are interested in the measure, and I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that perhaps it would be well to let the Senate proceed with the unfinished business until the Senator from Utah shall return to the city.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well, Mr. President, although I have tried for several days to have this measure considered, and supposed that there was an understanding that we adjourned last night in order that the measure might be considered this morning before 2 o'clock. I was not aware of the understanding to which the Senator from Arkansas has referred, and, at his request, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I express my thanks to the Senator, and, if I may have his attention for a moment, with the indulgence of the Senate, I was about to observe that our friend.

the late Senator Willis, the last time I saw him called my attention to this bill and to two or three other measures dealing with Philippine matters. It was his intention—and in that I agreed—that after certain matters going on in Ohio were disposed of he would ask to have them all taken up and considered. I was opposed to those bills, but I told the Senator I would not object to their being taken up and considered at such time as he indicated after his return from Ohio. The Senate knows the matters in Ohio which were engaging his attention. I relied upon that understanding, and I will say now to the Senator from Connecticut that I shall be willing, so far as I am concerned, to carry out the understanding that I had with our late friend, and take up these and other measures dealing with Philippine matters at such time in the near future as may be desired.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I shall make an effort on the next occasion when the Senator from Utah is present to move that this bill be considered. With regard to the other bills there is considerably more difference of opinion, and I do not desire to ask the Senate to devote much time to debating those bills. This bill, however, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands is particularly anxious to have passed at the earliest possible moment, and I hope the Senator will cooperate with me in securing an opportunity to debate the measure in the near future.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to cooperate with the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. It is my understanding that the motion made by the Senator from Connecticut encountered objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion has been withdrawn.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, line 19, after the word "section," it is proposed to insert the words "provided it is not a fruit or vegetable in its natural state or processed."

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, the question has often been asked by a great many people, "What is the matter with agriculture? Why has the great basic industry of the Nation been demoralized, suffered a loss of billions of dollars since the crisis came to agriculture in 1920, and at the same time industry has seen its greatest years of prosperity, and labor has received the highest wage since the dawn of civilization?"

Mr. President, the story of the demoralization of agriculture by our own Government, brought about by legislation during the war and since the war that destroyed all the economic relationships that existed between agriculture, industry, and labor since the foundation of this Government, is a simple story, and can be told in a few words.

Before the crisis came to agriculture in 1920 there existed a close relationship between agriculture, industry, and labor; and before that relationship was destroyed by legislation the prosperity of the industries meant the prosperity of agriculture and labor, and the same thing was true as far as agriculture was concerned. Before 1920 the prosperity of agriculture meant the prosperity of industry and labor.

In all the great panics that swept over this country before 1920, agriculture, industry, and labor all suffered alike; and to that rule there were no exceptions. I can remember something about the panic of 1873, and I can remember all about the panic of 1893. In those two great panics agriculture, industry, and labor all went down together in one great crash. Then we saw prosperity return, and agriculture, industry, and labor all came back together and enjoyed prosperity.

The first legislation passed by Congress, which has been a mighty factor in the destruction of the economic relationships that existed between agriculture, industry, and labor, was the Adamson law. The Adamson law changed the basis of a day's labor upon the railroads from a 10-hour day to an 8-hour day, and increased the price of labor on our railroads by an annual amount of $60,000,000. In order that that increase in the price of labor might be passed on to those who used the railroads for shipping freight, the Interstate Commerce Commission ordered an increase of freights of 15 per cent.

Then Congress passed the Federal control act, and Mr. McAdoo was made Director General of the Railroads; and almost immediately Mr. McAdoo ordered an increase in the price of labor on the railroads that was equal to an annual increase of $1,164,000,000. In order that the railroads might pass that increase in the price of labor of $1,164,000,000 on to the farmers, if you please, and all the rest of the people who used the railroads for shipping freight, Mr. McAdoo ordered a horizontal increase in freight rates of 25 per cent. In that horizontal increase no attention was paid to how high a rate was or how low the rate was or how long the haul was or what the product would bear to carry it to market. Farm products, with one or two exceptions, were increased in that horizontal increase in freight rates the same as high-class manufactured articles.

Then, Mr. President, in 1920 Congress passed the amendment to the interstate commerce act—the Esch-Cummins Act—which created the Labor Board, and in 1920 the Labor Board increased the price of wages on the railroads $522,000,000. Then, Mr. President, so that the railroads might pass this increase in the price of their labor on to those who used the railroads for shipping freight, the Interstate Commerce Commission ordered an increase of from 25 to 40 per cent and 33⅓ per cent in freight that passed the different zones that had been created by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Again, in this horizontal increase by the Interstate Commerce Commission in freight rates, which was put into effect with very little consideration, no attention was given to how high a freight rate was or how low it was or what the product would bear to carry it to market. Farm products again were increased by a horizontal increase of from 40 to 25 per cent.

Then in 1921 the Labor Board ordered a reduction in the price of labor equal to an annual reduction of $331,000,000. Following this decrease in the price of labor the Interstate Commerce Commission ordered a horizontal decrease in freight rates of 10 per cent.

We have had some increases in the price of labor since 1921. All together the annual increase in labor on our railroads is $1,550,887,874. This is an increase of 100 per cent in the price of labor upon our railroads.

Mr. President, if the Government had not followed each increase in the price of labor upon our railroads with an increase in freight rates, every mile of railroad in America in one short year would have been in the hands of a receiver.

The farmers of America are a mighty factor in furnishing freight to the railroads. Of the total volume of freight transported over our railroads, the farmer furnishes 11 per cent. Yet, at the same time, through these horizontal increases in freight rates which have been forced upon the farmer, no part of which he can pass on to the people, the farmers pay 19 per cent of the total revenues received by the railroads from the transportation of freight. Through the increase in freight rates since 1917 the farmers have paid an increased freight bill of $4,000,000,000; but the farmer's freight bill, Mr. President, is not the only part of the increased cost of production that he has been forced to meet in the last few years. It is not strange, when Congress changed the basis of a day's labor upon the railroads from a 10-hour day to an 8-hour day and increased the price of labor on the railroads by 100 per cent, that organized labor in every part of America should demand shorter hours and increased pay; and since 1917 there have been inaugurated in this country something over 12,000 strikes. In nearly every one of those strikes labor has brought about an increase in pay and shorter hours, until to-day in practically all the great industries of America labor is working on the 8-hour basis and has received an increase in pay of 100 per cent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I want to call the Senator's attention to the report issued last February by the Department of Commerce in a bulletin called "Survey of Current Business," in which the Government's own statistics show that the total average monthly pay roll of the United States has decreased 30 per cent in six years, and the Department of Labor's own statistician shows that there has been a decrease of more than 32 per cent since the high peak of employment in 1920.

Mr. GOODING. I am making my comparisons back before 1917, Mr. President. I am basing them on 1917.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I see.

Mr. GOODING. I am showing the increase in freight rates since 1917 and the increase in the price of labor. I think it is conceded everywhere that the price of labor to-day and the cost of production has been increased for the manufacturers and for the farmers 100 per cent, and I am basing my argument on that line.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me further——

Mr. GOODING. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will also state that the same bulletin of February, 1927—these are the Department of Labor's own statistics—shows that the average man working in the mine, the mill, and the factory is producing now 34 per cent more of the finished product than he did seven years ago. Here you have a product per individual 34 per cent greater than seven years ago, showing that the laborer is producing and giving to the employer a third more than he was seven years ago, and in the aggregate labor is getting 30 per cent less.

Mr. GOODING. That is not true on the railroads, Mr. President. I am very sure that so far as the railroads are concerned—in fact, I have the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission to that effect—we have had a steady increase in the price of labor since 1921, when the 10 per cent reduction was made.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, not in proportion to the efficiency of the labor.

Mr. GOODING. No; I will agree to that. I did not intend to take up time on this line of thought. This is true as far as the railroads are concerned: We have employed on the railroads to-day about 120,000 more men than in 1913, and yet we are transporting 100 per cent more freight over the same rails with an increase of 120,000 men than we were transporting in 1913. This has been brought about by larger engines, more efficiency, and better loading of cars.

Mr. BROOKHART. There were about 1,750,000 men in 1913.

Mr. GOODING. Yes; and there are a little less than 2,000,000 men now.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is true that the individual who is working is getting a higher daily wage than he did in 1913; but when the exchange value, the purchasing value of his present wages is taken into consideration, he may not be getting so much.

I shall not disturb the Senator further. I did not interrupt him for the purpose of any controversial colloquy. He simply made some general statements about labor that I wanted to clear up.

Mr. GOODING. The Senator did not understand the basis I gave in the beginning when I spoke of the price of labor.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. One other proposition in reference to this relation of labor to capital. In manufacturing there are invested about forty billions of capital, and there are employed fewer than 9,000,000 workers, producing a gross value of $60,000,000,000. Those are Department of Commerce figures. Nine million workers, or a little fewer than that, get only about $11,000,000,000 in wages. So that it is the big earnings of capital that are discriminating against the farmer in an unjust way rather than the high wages.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator has not the thought from anything I have said that I think the price of labor should be broken down. That is the farthest from my thought. What I am trying to do is to show what has happened to agriculture, and what this bill proposes to do is to step agriculture up with industry and labor. That is the fight we have been making.

Mr. BROOKHART. The point I was trying to make was that it is the exorbitant earnings of these combinations of capital that are depressing agriculture.

Mr. GOODING. I think I can give the Senator some information along that line before I get through.

The point I want to make is this: Not only the railroads would have been in the hands of receivers if they had not been able to pass the increase in their cost of operation onto those using the railroads, but the manufacturer is meeting to-day an increase in manufacture of 100 per cent in labor, he is meeting an increase in practically everything that goes into industry of 100 per cent. Fortunately, the manufacturer is able to pass his increase in the cost of manufactured articles on to the people.

Again, if the merchant living in a farming community, or living anywhere, for that matter, had not been able to pass on to the farmer his increase in freight rates, his increase in taxes, and his increase in everything which makes up the cost of transacting business to-day, he, too, would have been in bankruptcy. So that with an increased cost of production of a hundred per cent in the production of farm products—and I say this advisedly—it is not strange at all that agriculture is in bankruptcy.

The saddest thing I know of is to see a man who has passed the meridian of life lose the earnings of a lifetime, without any fault of his own, and be forced to commence life's work over again to provide a home for his declining years. Yet that is just what has happened to a million farmers in America, and a million more farmers in America are holding their homes to-day through the leniency of their creditors, and unless some legislation is passed that will be beneficial to agriculture they, too, sooner or later must lose their homes to the mortgage companies.

Since the crisis came to agriculture in 1920 the farmers have suffered a loss of more than $30,000,000,000. Since 1920, 2,000,000 of our farm population have left the farms each year to mill around in the great cities looking for employment. Most of them have been forced to return to the farm, but the actual net loss in our farm population since 1920 is between three and a half and four million.

In 1910 we had a farm mortgage indebtedness in this country of three and a half billion. To-day the total mortgage indebtedness of the farmer is something like twelve and a quarter billion dollars.

Since the crisis came to agriculture in 1920 more than 3,000,000 acres of land that were once fertile have been abandoned because the farmers are unable to buy fertilizer to keep up the fertility of the soil.

The President, in his annual message of December 3, 1924, in speaking on Muscle Shoals, called the attention of Congress to the great danger that confronts the country through the depletion of the fertility of the soil. The President said:

> The production of nitrogen for plant food in peace and explosives in war is more and more important. It is one of the chief sustaining elements of life. It is estimated that soil exhaustion each year is represented by about 9,000,000 tons and replenishment by 5,450,000 tons. The deficit of 3,550,000 tons is reported to represent the impairment of 118,000,000 acres of farm lands each year.

In the same message the President said that we had under cultivation in this country 370,000,000 acres of farm land. If the impairment of the fertility of the soil of 118,000,000 acres of land is going on each year, regardless of how slight that impairment may be in the fertility of the soil, there is a grave danger that sooner or later, and only too soon, no doubt, this country will not be producing enough to feed our own people.

The most important question to every nation is the fertility of its soil, because it is upon the soil that the foundations of all governments rest, and all down through the ages when the fertility of the soil of any country has been exhausted that country has gone down to decay.

In the fifth century, when the Huns and Vandals ravished the Roman Empire, the soil of Rome was producing only 4 bushels of wheat to the acre; and the production of all other farm products was in the same proportion. When the soil of Rome lost its virile force the manhood of Rome lost its virile force, and Rome went down to destruction.

In our own country show me a community where the soil has been exhausted for any length of time and it has become a struggle to keep the wolf from the door, and I will show you a community where the citizenship has gone backward with the soil.

Mr. President, I am sure every Senator will agree to this, that the farmer is the one man who never fixes the price of any farm products. He has to look in the morning paper to find out what the wheat exchange will give him for his wheat, how much the cotton exchange will give him for his cotton, and all down the line with every farm product. Somebody else always fixes the price of everything the farmer produces on the farm, and somebody else always fixes the price of everything that the farmer buys for the home or the farm. So he is shackled, if you please, with an increase of 100 per cent forced on him by his own Government, no part of which he can pass on, and it is not strange that he has lost $30,000,000,000 since 1920.

Through legislation we have created a new civilization in America, with the highest standards the world has ever known.

Through legislation we have created an impossible condition for the farmer to meet, for we have increased his cost of production so great and his freight rates so high that if he has a failure of crops, or a partial failure, or there is an overproduction, so that he is forced to sell his crops based on the world's market, which as a rule is below the cost of production in this country, there is grave danger that he may be forced into bankruptcy.

Mr. President, the present civilization, with its high standards, its shorter hours for labor, and its increase in the price of labor, has been beneficial to the whole country.

I do not believe that these standards will be or should be broken down. My hope is that we will be able to maintain the present American standard of wages that labor has enjoyed in the last few years.

I hope the time will come when we shall improve these standards and that labor will receive for its hire a fairer share of the great wealth that is produced in America.

The farmer, Mr. President, is not asking to tear down the present high standards of wages in America. His hope is that if this legislation passes he will be able to meet the present standard of wages in America and have something left at the end of the year to keep the wolf from the door.

All the farmers are asking for in this legislation, Mr. President, is the right and opportunity to transact their business along business lines the same as the great industries are transacting their business to-day.

It is a simple story, and it seems to me that anyone with an open mind who studies the legislation that has been passed in the last few years, and the increased cost of production, can understand why there is a farm problem. The farmer is not responsible for the farm problem. He is fighting for an opportunity to pass on some of his increased cost of production, and he will be able to do that if this bill shall become a law. It will give him at least a part of the protective tariff that was promised him when the Fordney-McCumber bill was passed, but which he can not get under the present conditions, when there is a surplus.

It has been a great disappointment to me that all of the New England and the other industrial States, almost without exception, are opposed to this bill. This Government has been kind to the industrial East. The Fordney-McCumber bill gave them the highest protective tariff they have ever enjoyed, and it has been through the principle of protection in America, along with other legislation, that we have developed the high cost of production of manufactured articles which the farmer has to bear. I am unable to understand how any Senator who believes in giving to any industry the honest difference between the cost of production in this country and in foreign countries can vote against this bill, because that is all the farmer could get, that is all that would be given him, with the exception of the cotton farmer.

The cotton growers, to my mind, are more fortunate than the wheat growers, because they are producing at the present time 65 per cent of all the cotton of the world. With proper organization, with proper marketing, they can fix the world's price for cotton, and when they do that they are not doing any more than every other country on earth is doing that has a monopoly of raw materials.

Mr. President, all the farmers are asking for in this bill is the right to receive American prices for their American products, on the American market, for an American cost of production, that has been forced on them by their own Government. That is all; nothing more. All the farmers are asking for in this legislation is the right—the right that has been given to industry in the Webb-Pomerene Act, which permits all the great industries to sell their manufactured articles abroad for less than what they receive on the American market without violating the Sherman antitrust law.

The farmer is not asking that we tear down the present high standard of wages. He is asking that he be put on a parity with industry and labor and that we give him back what we took away from him through legislation. That is all; nothing more.

Mr. President, those opposing the bill say we can not legislate prosperity to the farmer. We have legislated prosperity to the railroads by giving them practically a guaranty of 5¾ per cent on their investment, and the railroads to-day are enjoying the greatest prosperity in their history. We have legislated prosperity to the laboring man by giving him shorter hours and increased pay. We have legislated prosperity to the manufacturer by giving him, in the Fordney-McCumber Act, the highest protection that he has ever enjoyed.

On different occasions I have placed in the RECORD the cost of farm implements and the prices the farmer pays for the things he uses in the home and on the farm. In round numbers, it means 100 per cent of increase. The only way the farmers can be helped is to increase the price of their products upon the market. That is what the equalization fee provision in the pending bill will do. It is the most vital part of it. The bill will help, of course, in marketing. It will help cotton because we have a monopoly, so far as that is concerned, of the world supply of cotton. But it is going to give the farmer not the full 100 per cent of duty on wheat that is given in the Fordney-McCumber Act, but about 75 per cent, which is all he will be able to receive. In other words, before the wheat grower will be able to get the benefit of relief he will have to tax himself in order to bring about this result.

Mr. President, this country has never given serious thought or consideration to the great basic industry of the Nation—agriculture. We were practically the last country on earth to enact farm loan legislation and farm credit bank legislation. We were half a century behind some of the other countries in that work for the farmers. During the war this country gave less thought and consideration to its farmers than any other country on earth. We were the only country during the war that made a profit out of its wheat growers and its farmers. We made a profit of something over $62,000,000.

We were the only country on earth that fixed a maximum price on a bushel of wheat during the war. While we paid our farmers $2.20 and $2.26 a bushel for wheat, France paid her farmers $3.94 a bushel for wheat; Italy, $4.33; Spain, $4.96; Portugal, $3.25; Sweden, $2.95; Switzerland, $2.25; Rumania, $5.25. While our farmers were getting $2.20 and $2.26, the Canadian Government permitted their farmers to get the market price, the first year of the war $2.45 and the next year $2.77 a bushel. Australia permitted her farmers to receive the full market price and gave assistance in the way of freight rates, and in addition paid a bonus of something over $4,000,000. England continued her support to her grain growers until 1923, permitting her farmers to get the full market price, and in addition paid a bonus of something over $850,000,000.

Our farmers were encouraged to grow more wheat after the war was over and they increased the production of wheat, but the guaranty that had been made was withdrawn early in 1920. Then in a few short months wheat sold on the market in America for $1.50 per bushel.

Mr. President, the farmer is not asking, as I said, for any special legislation. All he wants is the same opportunity in this great country that we have given to industry. He has been a mighty factor in the pioneering and development of the country. There is no other country on earth that can be compared to our country in the language of agriculture. To-day, while we have only 7 per cent of the land of the world and 6 per cent of the population, we are producing 68 per cent of all the corn of the world, 65 per cent of all the cotton of the world, 46 per cent of all the tobacco of the world, 37 per cent of all the oats of the world, 24 per cent of all the wheat of the world, 18 per cent of all the flax of the world, 15 per cent of all the barley of the world, and 15 per cent of all the beans of the world. At the same time we are producing 76 per cent of all the apples that go into commercial use in the world, 37 per cent of all the oranges, and 36 per cent of all the lemons of the world. We have in this country 24 per cent of all the horses and mules of the world and 40 per cent of all the poultry of the world. We are producing between 33 and 35 per cent of the milk of the world, 30 per cent of the butter of the world, and from 12 to 15 per cent of the cheese of the world.

Mr. President, speaking in terms of agriculture, we are a mighty country, for we are producing to-day of the agricultural products produced in America nearly as much as the whole world combined, and yet it is a common thing to hear some one say: "If the farmer would go to work, milk a few more cows, and burn less gasoline, he would solve the farm problem himself."

Mr. President, there was no farm problem in America to solve before this Government changed the economic conditions of the country by legislation, and destroyed the parity that existed for more than 100 years between agriculture, industry, and labor.

How carefully this Government protected the railroad in its increased cost of operation that was forced upon it by legislation, but not a thought or consideration has yet been given for the increased cost of production it forced upon its farmers.

Mr. President, when we take an inventory of what has happened to agriculture, it is not strange that we have had more bank failures in the country since 1920 than all the bank failures put together from the Civil War up to 1920. I have a list of the bank failures which have taken place in the country and for the purposes of comparison I have made a division, taking the bank failures for the 11-year period from 1910, inclusive, up to July, 1920, and then taking the bank failures for the 7-year period from July 1, 1920, since the crisis came to agriculture, up to January 1, 1928, and putting them together for purposes of comparison.

Strange as it may seem, in the great industrial States of the Union there have been less bank failures in proportion to the time since 1920 than there were from 1909 up to 1920. In the New England and Eastern States, including the District of Columbia, from 1909 to 1920 we had 128 bank failures. From the 1st of July, 1920, to the 30th of June, 1927, in the New England and Eastern States we had 76 bank failures.

In the 13 Southern States for the first period of 11 years we had 220 bank failures and for the second period from 1920 to 1927 we had 1,116 bank failures. North Carolina had 17 bank failures for the 11 years prior to 1920 and had 108 bank failures for the last 7 years. South Carolina had only two bank failures for the 11 years prior to 1920, but had 191 bank failures for the last 7 years. In Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan there is but little difference in the matter of bank failures before 1'20 and from 1'20 up to the present time. Wisconsin is called a Middle West State and showed no bank failures for the period of 11 years referred to, but 59 for the past 7 years. Minnesota, a great agricultural State, had 23 bank failures for the period of 11 years prior to 1920 and 270 bank failures for the past 7 years. Iowa had 13 bank failures for the 11 years prior to 1920 and 453 bank failures for the last 7 years. Missouri had 18 bank failures for the period of 11 years prior to 1920, and 240 for the last 7 years.

The total number of bank failures in the Mid Western States for the period of 11 years referred to was 184, while for the last 7 years the bank failures in the Mid Western States were 1,327.

In the Western States, North Dakota had 6 bank failures for the 11-year period up to 1920 and 410 bank failures for the last 7 years. South Dakota had 16 bank failures for the 11-year period and 360 for the last 7 years. Nebraska had 8 bank failures for the period of 11 years prior to 1920 and 200 bank failures for the last 7 years. Wyoming had no bank failures for the 11-year period referred to, but has had 54 bank failures for the last 7 years. Colorado had 10 bank failures for the period of 11 years up to 1920, and 93 for the last 7 years. New Mexico had 10 bank failures for the first period to which I am referring and 62 for the last 7 years. Oklahoma had 7 bank failures for the first period of 11 years, and 227 bank failures for the last 7 years since the crisis came to agriculture. The total number of bank failures in the Western States for the first period of 11 years was only 71, while in the last 7 years, in the Western States, the agricultural States of the Union, we have had 1,795 bank failures.

Why, of course, there is an agricultural problem in America. Agriculture is not the only industry that suffers. The bankers and the business men and all the agricultural industries have met the same crisis that came to agriculture in 1920.

In the Pacific States Washington had 19 bank failures during the first period of 11 years and 49 bank failures during the last 7 years. Oregon had 7 bank failures during the first period of 11 years and 46 bank failures during the last 7 years. California had 4 bank failures during the first 11 years and 30 bank failures during the last 7 years. Idaho had 9 bank failures during the first period of 11 years and 72 bank failures during the last 7 years. Arizona had no bank failures during the first period of 11 years—there were 11 years without a bank failure in Arizona—and 35 bank failures during the last 7 years.

The total number of bank failures in the Pacific States during the first period of 11 years was 46, while during the last 7 years there have been 248 bank failures.

Mr. President, these bank failures tell a tragic story, and the conditions thus revealed can only be met by legislation. Legislation was responsible for the condition of agriculture, and it was equally responsible for the bank failures which occurred in agricultural communities where the farmers were not able to obtain the cost of production from the sale of their farm products.

During the first period of 11 years up to 1920 we had 642 bank failures. During the past seven years we have had 4,287 bank failures—more bank failures let me say again, if you please, than during all the years that intervened from the Civil War up to 1920. The average number of bank failures from 1909 to 1920 was 61 a year. In 1921 we had 396 bank failures; in 1922 we had 394 bank failures; in 1923 we had 314 bank failures; in 1924 there were 894 bank failures; in 1925 there were 550 bank failures; in 1926 there were 573 bank failures; and in 1927 we had 831 bank failures. But this only includes——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. GOODING. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Do the figures that the Senator is employing comprehend both State and National banks?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; with the exception of the year 1927. The 831 bank failures in 1927 include national-bank failures and the State-bank failures that occurred from the 1st of January up to June 30, 1927. There is no report available as to State-bank failures that occurred from the 1st of July to the 1st of January of this year. So, if we had a list of all the State-bank failures for the year 1927, there would be shown a greater number of bank failures for that year than at any time in the history of this country or at least at any time since the crisis came to agriculture.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. GOODING. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. What was the number of bank failures for 1927?

Mr. GOODING. For 1927 the number was 831, but that does not include the State-bank failures since June 30 of last year. I have just made the point that if the failures of State banks were included—and I regret that the figures are not available at this time, as I am advised by the Treasury Department—the number of bank failures for 1927 would be shown to be very much larger than for any other year in the history of the crisis that has come to agriculture and to the banks of America. The strange part about all this, as I am trying to make clear, is that the bank failures in large part, if not wholly, have only come to the agricultural States. I think it is safe to say, Mr. President, that there is less money in what may be called strictly agricultural banks to-day than there was in 1920 before the crisis came to agriculture.

Here is another evidence of the unbalanced condition so far as the wealth of America is concerned: The total deposits in all the banks of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1914, was $21,359,842,316. The total deposits in the banks of this country on the 1st day of January, 1928, had reached the enormous sum of $57,820,730,000, an increase in 14 years of $36,460,895,684. In other words, while the farmers of the United States have suffered a loss of more than $30,000,000,000, the industrial States of the Union have increased their wealth, as shown by the deposits in banks, more than one and one-half times in 13 short years. So it appears that the accumulations in banks as shown by their deposits have increased more in 13 years than in the whole preceding period from the time of the formation of this Government, and even before that, from the time the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock. As I have said, in 1914 the accumulation of deposits in the banks amounted to $21,359,842,316, while in 1928 it was $57,820,738,000.

Mr. President, the whole world has been astounded at the rapid accumulation of wealth in America during the last few years. There has been nothing to compare with it; we stand alone; and yet no part of that great accumulation of wealth has come to agriculture.

That is not all the evidence which can be furnished showing the unbalanced condition so far as the great wealth of America is concerned. In 1914 the estimated wealth of the United States was $200,000,000,000. The estimated wealth of the United States to-day is $355,500,000,000. In other words, since 1914 the wealth of the United States has increased $155,500,000,000. Everybody who knows anything about agriculture knows that no part of that great increase in wealth has come to agriculture. We have accumulated more wealth in America since 1914 than England accumulated in all her thousand years of existence.

The national wealth of England is rated at $120,000,000,000; that of France at $75,000,000,000; that of Russia at $73,000,000,000; that of Germany at $75,000,000,000; that of Belgium at $10,000,000,000; that of Italy at $26,000,000,000; and that of Canada $22,000,000,000.

Mr. President, there is still another evidence of the unbalanced condition of agriculture so far as the great accumulation of wealth is concerned, no part of which seems to be flowing toward agriculture. In 1914 the total foreign investments in this country were $4,500,000,000. To-day there is less than $2,000,000,000 of foreign investments in America. Those investments have been taken up by American capital. In 1914 this country had $2,000,000,000 invested in foreign countries, while to-day our investment in foreign countries is between $12,500,000,000 and $13,000,000,000, and it is increasing at the rate of $2,000,000,000 a year.

We speak of a billion dollars nowadays as easily as we used to speak of a million dollars. It is pretty hard to comprehend exactly what a million means in relation to dollars and cents. It is almost impossible to comprehend what is meant by a billion dollars; but in order to have a better understanding of what a billion dollars means, I have here figures showing the assessed valuation of a number of groups of States. The great industrial New England States—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut—have an assessed valuation for tax purposes of $12,251,108,058—not as much, if you please, as the investments which a few great captains of industry and a few bankers have in foreign countries.

The assessed valuation of the South Atlantic States, comprising Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, is $11,866,325,692, which is again less than the amount a few Americans have invested in foreign countries.

The South Central States—Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, and Mississippi—have an assessed valuation of $6,448,351,307; the Mountain States—Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, and Nevada—$4,741,157,770; and the Pacific Coast States—Oregon, Washington, and California—have an assessed valuation of $9,322,793,821. So when we come to realize that a few individuals in America have accumulated so much wealth that they are able to invest a portion of it only abroad, and that that portion amounts to more than the total assessed valuation of the groups of States I have mentioned, it gives some kind of an idea of what a billion dollars really means.

Of the $13,000,000,000 invested in foreign countries nearly $6,000,000,000 is invested in industries. We invested $1,250,000,000 in Cuba in the sugar plantations. Not satisfied with exploiting the cheap labor in Cuba, they imported coolie labor from China to go down there and work for 30 and 40 cents a day, and feed themselves at that, Mr. President; yet we have given Cuba a preferential duty on sugar to compete with American production, where we pay $3 a day and where there is the highest cost of production in all the world, because we have the highest standards in all the world.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOODING. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. How much does that added cost of sugar cost the housewives of this country?

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I think the Senator knows that this is the age of organization and combinations. Wipe out our tariff and give Cuba a monopoly on sugar, and the housewives of this country will pay twice what they are paying at the present time.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I have no desire to wipe out the tariff, because I happen to be a tariff Democrat; but I think the argument for this bill could be made very strong when it is shown that all these tariff additions to cost are really a subsidy in a sense to help certain industries; and if these industries are to be helped, why is not the farmer helped?

Mr. GOODING. Simply because he is without organization. He has not had anybody fighting his battles. He has been overlooked, like a white chip, as we say in the West, on a faro-bank table. He has been considered of no significance, apparently, in the affairs of this great Government; and yet he has produced much of the wealth of it.

In order that the Senator may understand what is coming to the sugar industry, I send to the desk an article from the Wall Street Journal and ask that it be read. It is something that we have got to pay some attention to in this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal of Tuesday, March 27, 1928]

THREE COUNTRIES LIMIT EXPORTS

Representatives of the sugar industries of Czechoslovakia, Germany, and Poland have agreed to limit sugar exports in 1928–29 to 1,268,000 short tons. Czechoslovakia is to export 66 per cent, Poland 17.5 per cent, and Germany 16.5 per cent of this amount. Czechoslovakia is thus authorized to export 837,000 short tons, compared with an estimated 982,000 short tons in the 1927–28 season; Germany, 209,000, compared with probably 160,000; Poland, 222,000, compared with about 278,000. Any participating country that can not export all its quota must cede the unused portion to the others. The plan is expected to cause a reduction of about 5 per cent in Czechoslovakia's sugar-beet acreage. Reports have not been received as to how the acreage of Poland and Germany will be affected.

Argentina has passed a law fixing the maximum production on all sugar mills in the Province of Tucuman at 70 per cent of the total quantity produced in 1926. The law is to be effective for three years, subject to modification in case of crop failure. In the Dominican Republic a sugar defense commission has taken steps to limit the crop to the capacity of the present mills, and a tax of 150 per cent ad valorem has been placed on importation of sugar machinery to discourage the establishment of any additional sugar centrals. This tax does not apply to replacement machinery for the mills in operation.

Preliminary estimates indicate the raw sugar supplies of the United States, excluding stocks and carry-over, will be about 4.5 per cent larger in this year than last. Domestic production shows an increase of 20.4 per cent over that of last year.

Mr. GOODING. I will say to the Senator from New York that Cuba has also passed legislation limiting the production of sugar. This year her mills are forbidden to grind over 4,500,000 tons of sugar. That is 500,000 tons less than the mills ground last year. We have given Cuba, as I was saying, a preferential duty of 26 cents per hundred on sugar. Now we find that Cuba has sent her agents all over the world, trying to form a combination and bring about a marketing organization so that at no time will Cuba receive less than the full benefit of the tariff, as far as that is concerned.

I want to call the Senator's attention to that line of organization that is going on in the world, and the investment of American capital all over the world. The time is coming when we shall have to have protection against American capital invested in foreign countries. They have forgotten how generous and how kind America has been to them in the accumulation of their great wealth; and wherever they can find an opportunity to exploit cheap labor, there is where American capital is going to-day. Why, we have gone over to China and taken over the dried-egg industry over there, and the egg industry as a whole.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Then why do not we, as a Nation, recognize the necessity of permitting in this country such combinations as to bring here the labor and to make here the investments? We have in certain directions the outrageous application of the antitrust laws, which prevent such combinations. Now, the Senator himself is dealing with the soft-coal industry. If you would take away from it the embarrassment of the antitrust laws, and permit combinations, the closing of unprofitable mines, and cooperative marketing under governmental control, you would solve your problem.

Mr. GOODING. I am advocating that. We are having hearings along that line, hoping to develop something that will make that possible.

I realize, and have said publicly a number of times, that we have reached the period in the history of this country when the Sherman Antitrust Act can no longer be enforced; and I doubt the wisdom of it any longer, if we can have proper governmental regulation. I am opposed, however, to giving the coal operators or anybody else a monopoly in America unless we can have with it proper regulation. I am sure that if we are going to move along and keep pace with the rest of the world we shall have to pass some legislation of that kind, and permit a bigger and a broader operation of combinations and of wealth in America.

Mr. COPELAND. I rejoice to hear the Senator say that, because personally I am convinced that unless we do permit these combinations we are going to drive more and more capital abroad. The cartels over there are combinations under governmental regulation which we should permit here; but the Senator is right, of course, in saying that if we are to permit these combinations, and the release of these industries from the operation of the antitrust laws, it must be with governmental regulation. Otherwise, there will be monopolistic tendencies which would ruin the public.

Mr. GOODING. Speaking of German cartels, as we call them, practically all of Europe has gone into an organization now in nearly all manufacturing lines. France, Germany, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Luxemburg, Austria, and Hungary are all in a combination to fix prices, limit production, and divide territory in the production of raw steel. Of course, if that should be undertaken in America we would send them all to the penitentiary under the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for just a moment further, the Senator himself is in a strategic position. He is engaged in this soft-coal investigation. He has an opportunity there to work out and to apply the very theory that he is discussing; and if he can make a success of it in that particular enterprise it will be an example to our country which will make possible such combinations under governmental control as will develop the country along the very lines that the Senator has enlarged upon so eloquently this morning.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, God knows that after my investigation of the situation down there in Pennsylvania, after listening now for weeks to the horrible details of conditions that exist in our own country, worse than those of Russia, my heart is in the work; and with the help of the splendid men who are on the Interstate Commerce Committee I am satisfied that we are going to work out some solution of that great problem. We are trying mighty hard to interest the operators. However, they are not coming through with the spirit that we had hoped they would come through. I wish they could realize that we can not solve the problem, we can not help labor in America, without their cooperation. I will say "organized labor," because I doubt whether this form of Government is safe to-day without organized labor. I found everywhere down in the coal fields, where this bitter strife is on, industrial war, an organization known as the Ohio and Pennsylvania Relief Society offering food and clothing to the distressed miners. At first they accepted food and clothing. When they found out that these people who offered this relief were the agents and representatives of the most dangerous organization America has ever known, the Industrial Workers of the World organization, which is only out to destroy governments, to their credit they refused to accept it.

The United Mine Workers of America and the American Federation of Labor won my heart by the splendid fight they have been making against bolshevism. Aside from the American Legion forces, they are the only forces in America that are out fighting in the open the most dangerous organization this Government or any other government has ever known. I promise the Senator that so far as my strength and my ability are concerned I am determined that this investigation shall not end and the work shall not stop until some legislation has been passed that is going to relieve a condition that has been forced on this country every few years, when there is danger of people freezing to death or suffering from a lack of coal to keep them warm.

Out in my own State, during the time I was governor, I investigated two coal famines. They were not brought about by strikes, but through reckless carelessness on the part of the railroads, as a result of which in the town of Boise, the capital of the State, there was not enough coal to keep the homes warm, and we had two deaths in some of the poorer families of that State. I know that the Senator from New York has been working on this problem. He has introduced a bill dealing with it, and we may be able to accept many of the provisions of his bill when we come down to framing legislation. I know that we shall have his good support and his help, so far as he is able to give it, to bring about a better condition in the coal industry.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I was wondering whether the Senator was going to call attention to the fact that the sugar situation in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico ought to be looked into very carefully, because it seems to me that there injustice is being done more than anywhere else. All sugar from the Philippine Islands comes into this country free, and I have statements of the companies producing sugar in those islands.

In an interview with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the leading sugar producer—and most of them are Spanish—gave him a statement of what they were doing in the Philippine Islands. The largest factory there, operated by Spaniards, owned by Spaniards, made over 51 per cent profit upon the amount of money invested in the sugar plants of that company. When the Senator from Montana asked him, "What wages are you paying your men?" he answered, "Forty cents a day." All that sugar comes into this country free. They can turn it upon the market any time they want to in order to destroy the price.

Cuba is suffering from that, and what do we find as to our own Porto Rico, what are they doing in Porto Rico? Sugar comes in from Porto Rico. They import sugar cane at a dollar a ton and make that sugar cane into sugar, and it comes into this country free of duty, because it comes from Porto Rico.

Those are the items, I want to say to the Senator from New York, that ought to be corrected, and sugar is the one commodity raised by the farmer that is cheaper to-day than it was before the war.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I can not understand, I would like to say to the Senator from Utah, why it is that the farmers are not using their great influence to permit the more extensive use of corn sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows, of course, that corn sugar can not enter into a great many things used by the American people.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree with that fully.

Mr. GOODING. And I will say to the Senator that, as far as sugar is produced, we can produce beet sugar and cane sugar in every State in the Union.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree with that.

Mr. GOODING. We can grow sugar enough in America for the whole world if we were protected properly.

Mr. COPELAND. There is the possibility, however, of bringing into use for commercial canning and preserving probably twenty or thirty million dollars' worth of corn sugar. All we have to do to accomplish that is to permit the use of corn sugar without the label mentioning it, and then it is put upon the same plane of equality for those particular uses with other sugars. The bill of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] pending here, the Cole-Capper bill, ought to be passed. It would mean $20,000,000 worth of cash corn to the farmers of this country.

Mr. GOODING. I will say to the Senator that we have never made such a study into the development of industry as we ought to make, and that is what I am complaining about. It never has been done. If we should make such a study, it would be found that there are a thousand things we can do that we are not doing to-day, and the time is coming when we must make such a study if we are going to keep our own people employed.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me interrupt just a moment; and I want the Senator from Utah to hear this, who thinks that the corn sugar bill did pass. Last year it passed, but in the consideration of the conference report it was held up, and did not become a law.

Mr. SMOOT. The House did not even pass it.

Mr. COPELAND. The House passed it last year.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking of when it passed the Senate, when Senator Cummins had it passed, I think four years ago, but I will not be sure.

Mr. COPELAND. It passed in the last Congress. It came back with an amendment from the House, and died here; the conference report was not adopted. In that one item the Senator from Idaho could give to the farmers twenty or thirty million dollars that they do not receive to-day.

Mr. GOODING. We ought to have about $250,000,000 more out of sugar easy enough that we are giving to Cuba, that belongs to America by rights. If we will develop a balanced condition on the farm, and when I say balanced condition I mean grow those things upon the farm that we can grow in America as well as they can be grown in most countries on the earth, if not better, it will mean that we will not have any surplus of farm products in America, we will wipe out the surplus, we will stop exhausting the soil, and we will give the farmers of America a chance to get enough for their farm products so that they can buy fertilizer and keep up the fertility of the soil.

I want to go on, because I want to direct the attention of my friends on the other side of the aisle who are interested in cotton to what the rest of the world is doing. Here we are with a monopoly of the world's supply of cotton, 65 per cent of it, and never lifting a finger to help that great industry, while we have permitted foreign countries to ship into America every year something over $900,000,000 worth of products on which the prices have been fixed because they have a monopoly in those particular commodities.

Twenty-one per cent of all importations that come into America are of commodities in which foreign countries have a monopoly and fix prices.

Here is what they were doing with what we call the German cartels in Europe.

Rails: Great Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, Luxemburg, have an agreement under which they fix the price of rails, divide territory, and limit production.

Tools: Germany, France, Belgium, Luxemburg, Great Britain, Austria, Czechoslovakia and Poland, practically all of Europe, combine to control the production of tools.

Aluminum: France, Germany, Great Britain, Switzerland, Norway, and part of Austria combine to control the price of aluminum.

Wire: Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and Hungary combine to control the production of wire.

Glue: Most of the European countries combine in fixing the price that America must pay for glue.

Artificial silk: Great Britain, Germany, and Italy, including a number of factories that those countries have in America for making artificial silk, combine under an agreement under which they fix the price, divide territory, and make us pay the price.

Copper: We find the United States, Spain, Belgium, and Great Britain in a combination to control the price of copper, fixing the world price, the American price, limiting the production, and dividing territory.

Electric bulbs: Germany, the United States, Canada, France, Italy, the Scandinavian countries, Great Britain, Austria, and Hungary are all in the electric-bulb combination. I remember when one of the attorneys from the Department of Justice came before the Committee on Interstate Commerce—I think two years ago—and in discussing some case that they had involving the General Electric people, which was then before the courts, made the statement that while the electric bulb formed only 5 per cent of the General Electric's business, yet it accounted for 20 per cent of the total revenue of the company. There is a combination that reaches not only this country but the whole world. Yet we stand here with 65 per cent of the production of cotton and say we can do nothing with it.

Plate glass: France and Belgium have a combination to control the price of plate glass.

Glass bottles: Germany, France, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Poland have an agreement as to glass bottles.

Borax: Great Britain, the United States, Germany, France, and Austria have a combination in relation to borax. We have one borax bed out in Nevada, in what is called Death Valley. Yet we are in a combination to fix prices for the rest of the world, and have fixed them.

I want to offer these tables for the RECORD. First, I want to read the list of raw materials, as we call them, in which other countries fix the price. There are cotton, coffee, rubber, sisal, camphor, mercury, nitrates, sodium of nitrates, potash, Chilean potash, Chilean nitrates, German fertilizer.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I have been unable to find the reference, but some time since Christmas I presented to the Senate at some length a discussion of the very matter of which the Senator is speaking, and I put into the RECORD the report of our commercial attaché to Belgium, and also to France, to show exactly what those combinations are. I speak of it now in order that the RECORD may show it, because it indicates how extensively they have gone into this very matter.

I agree with the Senator that unless we can meet that competition in some way it will be a serious menace to us, not alone to the agricultural world but also to our industrial life, and there must be found a solution.

Among other papers I introduced in the RECORD in connection with my speech was an address made by Colonel Donovan, the Assistant to the Attorney General, in which he discussed the legal aspects of these combinations, pointing out that they might be formed under our law with proper governmental supervision. As the Senator from Idaho has wisely said, unless there can be found a way to meet this competition we are going to be at the mercy of these great trusts and combinations of the Old World.

Mr. GOODING. Yes, Mr. President. The list I have here showing the different commodities in which other countries have monopolies and fixed prices, and the cartels I have mentioned, is only a part of the story. These are the only industries that have made reports and made records. I am advised that there are a great many other combinations of which there is no public record. I offer these lists for the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERNATIONAL CARTELS

OCTOBER 10, 1927.

The following is a list of the outstanding international cartels. No complete list is available, since there are a number of international industrial understandings and combinations which have never been acknowledged by the interests involved:

Commodity	Countries involved	Date of organization
Raw steel	France, Germany, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Luxemburg, Austria, and Hungary.	September, 1926.
Rails	Great Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, Luxemburg.	June, 1926.
Tubes	Germany France, Belgium, Luxemburg, Great Britain, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland.	Do.
Aluminum	France, Germany, Great Britain, Switzerland, Norway (in part), Austria (in part).	August, 1926.
Enamel ware	Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Hungary.	1926.
Glue	Most European countries	July, 1926.
Artificial silk	Great Britain, Germany, Italy (including a number of plants controlled by Great Britain and Germany in the United States).	January, 1927.
Copper	United States, Spain, Belgium, Yugoslavia, Great Britain (?).	October, 1926.
Electric bulbs	Germany, United States, Canada, Netherlands, France, Italy, the Scandinavian countries, Great Britain, Austria, Hungary.	1924.
Plate glass	France, Belgium	1904.
Glass bottles	Germany, France, Austria, the Scandinavian countries, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Holland.	1907.
Borax	Great Britain, United States, Germany, France, Austria.	1899.[1]
Wire	Germany, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Netherlands.	February, 1927.

[1] Not certain as to its present existence.

In addition to the above cartels, there are a number of combinations which, while they can not be designated as cartels, have a great controlling influence on the production of certain commodities. Among these might be mentioned the Swedish-American Match Trust, which has a large number of factories scattered throughout the world, and in a number of countries controls the match trade and industry through a Government monopoly; the Franco-German potash combine; the explosives combination (Germany, Great Britain). There are also several combinations now under discussion, such as the zinc-selling combination, more or less similar to the copper-export combination; a cast-iron pipe cartel; a selling cartel for shapes and semifinished steel. There are also negotiations going on between the German, British, and French chemical combinations.

LOUIS DOMERATZKY,
Chief, Division of Regional Information.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, the story of the hardships and privations and great losses that have come to agriculture is not complete without a brief mention of the part the Federal Reserve Board took in deflating the country in 1920.

On May 18, 1920, Governor Harding called a meeting of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal advisory council and class A directors of the Federal reserve banks. The meeting was a secret one, and very little was known outside of banking circles of what transpired at that meeting until February 22, 1923, when the Manufacturers Record, of Baltimore, published a stenographic report of the proceedings of that meeting, which I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a few days after it appeared in that magazine. At that secret meeting of May 18, 1920, the question of restriction of credits, breaking down of prices, and increasing of freight rates was generally discussed and agreed to.

At that meeting Mr. Wardrop, of the Cleveland Reserve Bank, said:

I think a reasonable depression of business would be a good thing for the country.

He added:

I really think we would do better if we could get down to a lower basis, a different basis, and from that we could work up again.

When Mr. James A. Alexander, one of the class A directors of the Federal reserve bank in New York, was asked about transportation in his district, he said:

There is almost no such thing there now—

And added—

there is one thing I think to be feared, and that is if the transportation facilities are improved and commodities moved freely and credits are to be released, it may bring a temporary ease in the money market and may encourage people to go ahead and expand; I believe now is the time to put the rates up and keep them up.

While at this secret meeting those who control the banking interests of America were entering into a conspiracy to deflate the country by breaking down prices and restricting credits they passed a resolution calling on the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Shipping Board to increase freight rates and appointed a committee to present their resolution to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Shipping Board. The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That this conference urge as the most important remedies that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board give increased rates and adequate facilities such immediate effect as may be warranted under their authority, and that a committee of five be appointed by the Chair to present these resolutions to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board, with such verbal presentation as may seem appropriate to the committee.

At first, Mr. President, it was hard for me to understand why these great bankers who had met to restrict credits and deflate prices should pass a resolution asking the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board to increase freight rates; but I soon found, Mr. President, that the great bankers who met with the Federal Reserve Board on May 18, 1920, in that secret meeting held in this city, represented financial interests that owned and controlled a large majority of the stocks and bonds of the railroads in this country. So it is not strange after all that they should want to protect their railroads from the deflation that they were about to force upon the country.

The effects of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. President, extended far beyond that secret meeting of May 18, 1920, for at that time an organization was perfected for the bankers of the whole country. I know that some of the bankers from my own State attended the meeting at Chicago—and generally, I am sorry to say, that bankers from all over the country, or too many of them at least, participated in an effort to deflate the country.

It is not strange, Mr. President, that the great crash came to agriculture in 1920, and I anticipate some of the bankers who participated in that movement paid the penalty by seeing the doors of their own banks closed and their institution in bankruptcy.

Mr. President, the conspiracy of the Federal Reserve Board in 1920 will go down in history as the greatest conspiracy of modern times.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the McNary farm relief bill which is under discussion and want to address myself for a brief period to that measure.

Mr. President, it has long been the custom to give the farmer a great deal of attention in campaign years. The politicians sing their praises and eloquently orate upon the important part the American farmer plays in the very life of our Nation. Yet the real importance of agriculture, as compared with that of other great industries, is not generally understood.

On March 25 of this year the New York Times printed an article entitled the "Twenty giants of American industry," and agriculture ranks first. It is first in number of employees, first in the value of products produced, and first in the value of investments.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert this table in the RECORD as a part of my remarks:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this table shows that agriculture is by far the most important industry in America. There are three times as many people employed on the farms as there are in any other one industry. The value of the Nation's crops and products from the farms is twice as great as that of any other industry. The investment in farm property is over $57,000,000,000, being more than twice as much as is invested in any other industry. During the past few years it has practically been impossible for the average farmer to pay interest and taxes on his property, yet nearly every other industry is dependent on agriculture; and, in fact, the very life of the people is entirely dependent on food and clothing products grown on farms.

One of the reports by the national industrial corporation board of New York puts the average wages of the farmer at $736 per year. That amount, however, included $630 for the estimated value of food, fuel, and housing furnished by the farm, leaving a cash yearly wage of $106 for the average farmer of the United States.

These figures were furnished by a business men's organization after a careful investigation. These figures show a condition which exists in the face of the fact that the value of agricultural investment is more than twice as much as that of any other industry in the United States. But the other industries make the profits.

A great deal is said about the prosperity of our country. This does not apply, however, to the farmers. Will Rogers, the cowboy humorist, says:

> The country, as a whole, is prosperous; but that does not mean that it is prosperous as a whole.

He may be right. It takes a humorist to talk about our great prosperity. Prosperity talk is nothing short of a joke when the whole population of our country is considered.

A few years ago a university professor said that 2 per cent of the people owned two-thirds of the wealth of the country. Of course, that meant that the balance of us—or 98 per cent—owned one-third. But now statisticians say that 1 per cent of the people own approximately 99 per cent of the wealth, and that the wealth is rapidly concentrating into fewer and fewer hands year by year. Figures like these are poor proof for the statement that the so-called prosperity is general.

Prosperity certainly has not reached the producers of food products and of other necessities that are raised upon the farms of this country; neither has it reached the average business man and banker of the great agricultural districts.

The Hon. Houston Thompson, formerly a member of the Federal Trade Commission, is authority for the statement that last year "there were 48,758 bankruptcies in the United States, with a total loss of $885,557,006"; and that loss is $200,000,000 more than the bankruptcy losses of the previous year in spite of all the boasted prosperity.

It can certainly be said that some of our people are prosperous, because the number of millionaire income taxpayers paying on an income of $1,000,000 or more was 225 in 1926, and was on the increase in 1927. In 1926, 14 persons had incomes of more than $5,000,000 each. What I am trying to point out is that while wealth concentrates in the hands of the few, there is less for the average person; and that means that the distribution of prosperity is unfair, to say the least. The number of failures, as stated by the former Federal trade commissioner, shows a very unhealthy condition, for when this decidedly lopsided prosperity is on the increase, it means that poverty is also on the increase. It means that the very rich are getting richer and that the poor are getting poorer.

Mr. President, no farmers are included in the millionaire class, but a lot of farmers are included among the number of bankruptcies. According to the Census Bureau 2,155,000 farm people left the farms of the United States in 1926. Not all were bankrupts, but the bulk of them starved out on the farms and went to the already overcrowded cities for employment.

Practically all the business failures are in the agricultural districts, showing that agriculture and those depending on it are far from being prosperous.

The number of farm tenants has made a marked increase, and the landowning farmers are on the decrease, as the mortgages of approximately 170,000 farm owners are being foreclosed annually.

The politicians who have started to shout prosperity—and will probably continue it until after the fall elections—do not tell how the farmers' purchasing power has decreased. The falling off of the purchasing power of the farmer has added more to the failure of business men of the agricultural districts than any other factor. It has been reflected in every city in the West and South and is beginning to be felt throughout the entire country. People who have felt the sting of deflation will not be led to follow the mirage of so-called prosperity unless constructive legislation is enacted to assist the farmers in getting honest marketing conditions and thus tending to make real prosperity—prosperity of the many as well as prosperity of the few.

It is conceded by the best economists that any material decrease of the purchasing power of any great class of our people is detrimental to the country in general. It is impossible to have anything like general prosperity until we have something like a general square deal for all classes of our people.

The purchasing power of the farmer has materially decreased. He has been made the "goat" by the agencies of his own Government. During the war time he was not only urged but commanded, as a patriotic duty, to increase his acreage and produce more food products. Food was needed to win the war. He was urged to borrow money for this purpose, and thousands of the farmers did borrow money. Production was immensely increased. Farm prices were regulated by Government agencies and to the disadvantage of the producer; and then, in 1920, when the autocratic, all-powerful Federal Reserve Board, who were the governmental "guardian angels" of the credit of the Nation, decided that the artificial inflation which they themselves had largely brought about had gone far enough they deliberately issued a secret edict and the so-called deflation began.

The farmer was again made the "goat." His loans were demanded. He was forced to sell his products far below cost of production. The deflation in farm prices amounted to billions of dollars, and thousands upon thousands of farmers all over this Nation went broke and out of business. Many small banks and small business interests went broke with the farmers, and the effects were soon felt even by some of the big manufacturing interests of the East.

The factories of the European war nations began to send in their manufactured products and to sell them under the American prices. That, of course, was dangerous. Something must be done and done quickly. American industry must be protected.

The Congress of the United States, which had so supinely held back and allowed the product of their own creation—the Federal Reserve Board—to deflate the farmers and small business men by the millions, rushed to the aid of the big manufacturers.

Of course, American industries should be protected by Congress; but so should the American farmer, who produces the food products to feed the Nation, have been protected by Congress and not allowed to have been deflated by some thirty billions of dollars.

When the manufacturers were in distress an emergency existed, Congress passed an emergency tariff measure and a regular high-tariff schedule for their benefit, a tariff schedule based, as we have been repeatedly told, on the difference in cost of production here and abroad; based on cost of production here at the highest war-time wages and war prices, and based on the production abroad by war-ridden nations at starvation wages and prices. That tariff schedule still stands, and to the disadvantage of the farmers and everyone else in the agricultural districts.

The friends of agriculture have long urged adequate farm legislation—the McNary-Haugen bill, which, we believe, will tend to put the farmers more nearly on a parity with the manufacturers and other business interests.

The great majority of the farmers in the agricultural districts of the country, and a great majority of the business men of the same districts, are in favor of and are demanding farm relief legislation, and they believe that this bill is a big step in that direction.

The demand is growing and will continue to grow and become more insistent until favorable action is taken for agriculture. I want to appeal to the Republican Members of the Senate. In North Dakota there is a distinction made in the Republican ranks—"real" Republicans and progressives. Here they are called "regular" Republicans and progressives. I want to appeal to the "regular" Republicans and ask them if it is not high time that the promises that have been made in party platforms be carried out, especially in behalf of the agricultural interests of this Nation, and it is a mighty poor excuse to say that this is not the time to fulfill party pledges, because it is on the eve of another election. It would seem to me that this is the appointed time to fulfill those promises if you want the votes of the great agricultural districts of our country.

I want also to appeal to the Democratic Members, and ask them if it is not time that their party pledges be fulfilled, and it is no excuse for the Democrats to say that they are not in the majority here and not responsible for legislation. The fact that a Member here does not belong to the majority group does not in any way relieve him of his obligations to the people.

If the Members of the United States Senate are really interested in the welfare of the farmers, if they are interested in the general business conditions of the great agricultural districts, if they are interested in fulfilling their party pledges, let them so express themselves on this vote for this much-needed farm-relief measure, which we believe will help to put agriculture on a paying basis.

The Federal Government has aided the bankers to form a gigantic banking organization. It has given the railroads a commission which is national in scope. It has built up protection for manufacturers which is international in its results, and the so-called "infant" industries have been guarded by economic fortifications. The question now is, What is the Government going to do for an industry which comprises one-third of the population—the farmers—and which is not only in its infancy in organization but undernourished by unfair and unjust marketing conditions which fail to give it a profit.

The great combines and trusts have been able efficiently to organize because of the close proximity of their offices in a narrow street in our largest metropolis. On the other hand, the farmers have over 6,000,000 offices spread over a vast empire which stretches from ocean to ocean with all its natural and artificial barriers.

The marketing problem can only be solved by a well-knit national organization with governmental aid and all the prestige and support that such a Federal organization would carry with it. It will only be through such assistance that a new and scientific system of marketing can be finally established. Such a system would work to the benefit of both the producers and the consumers alike and give the Nation an unquestionable and unparalleled prosperity, which will be generally enjoyed, instead of the present brand of prosperity, which is confined to a few who incidentally have the press to tell the rest of us what a fine thing this prosperity is.

Through a Federal legislative program every great industry that has been successful has been able to stabilize prices and protect its own best interests. The farmers now believe it is their turn, and their demand has found expression in this measure known as the surplus control act. Through this measure the farmers hope to obtain the cost of production plus a fair profit, and they now know that this can only be obtained through organized bargaining power. In order further to carry out this plan they believe that farmers should maintain a rigid control of surpluses. This is the purpose of the bill.

The bill provides for a Federal farm board of 12 members, 1 from each of the Federal land-bank districts and various advisory boards. The duty of these boards will be to control the surplus that goes into the export trade, which has in the past forced down the prices in the home market to the level of the world prices. This would tend to place the farmer on the American standard that other industries now enjoy. His products would not come into direct and disastrous competition with foreign products.

The bill also provides for an equalization fee to be assessed against these surplus products entering into foreign markets. This is the provision that seems to be the bone of contention between the forces who want a bill with teeth in it, and the forces, on the other hand, who want to pass a measure for political expediency. The opponents of this feature of the measure are willing to accept almost any form of a bill carrying an appropriation in almost any amount, provided that the equalization fee is eliminated. The advocates of the bill believe that only through the equalization fee can anything like genuine relief be afforded.

The opponents of this measure object to the equalization fee because, they say, it is a new principle and an experiment. All new legislation in this sense has been untried and so might be called an experiment.

The Interstate Commerce Commission was an experiment when the act passed; the Federal reserve act had never been tried; the original tariff law had no precedent. So it is with all new legislation. It is impossible to know in advance exactly how any new law will work out, but if the board, which is appointed to put into operation and administer this measure, is honestly in favor of making a success of it, is honestly in favor of working out better marketing conditions for agricultural products, there is no question in my mind but what this legislation will work out for the interests of the farmers and give them a more honest and better marketing condition and assist them to make agriculture a paying business.

Its opponents say this is special or class legislation. Such objection does not come with good grace in view of what might be called similar legislation for other industries.

This surplus control act, with a Federal farm board using the equalization fee for stabilization of prices of farm crops, will still be a long way short of what the Federal reserve act is for the big bankers, the transportation act is for the railroads, away short of what the tariff is for the great manufacturing industries, and away short of what many other Federal laws are for special interests. But we do believe that this measure is a beginning that must be made.

THE COST OF LIVING AND FARM PRICES

The opponents of the McNary-Haugen bill say that if this measure is put into operation there will be an increase in the cost of living. I doubt if the amount of increase will be noticed by the average consumer. In fact, it has been stated by the representatives of organized labor that if there were an increase in the price of farm products to the farmers the wage earners were willing to pay a little more in order that the farmers may receive a price for their products which will include the cost of production plus a fair profit. Organized labor, and everyone else for that matter, knows that the only way to make a success of any business is to get cost of production, overhead expenses, and a fair profit.

Statistics which have been compiled by authorities in the Department of Agriculture show that for a five-year period while the price of wheat varied $1.31 per bushel the average cost of a loaf of bread in New York City during the same period had only varied three-tenths of 1 cent. In other words, when wheat was 90 cents per bushel, bread sold on an average of 9.7 cents per pound loaf; and later, when the farmer received $2.21 for a bushel of wheat, bread sold for only 10 cents per pound loaf. Therefore the payment of a few more cents for a bushel of wheat would have only an inappreciable effect, if any, on the cost of bread.

An increase of 1 cent per bushel on wheat means a million dollars annually for the farmers of North Dakota. An increase of 50 cents per bushel would add $50,000,000 to the purchasing power of the farmers of my State, and this means that they could buy just that much more in manufactured products, the sale of which always adds to the general prosperity of business, working people, and all others concerned.

The average person consumes about one barrel of flour in a year. There are 4.4 bushels of wheat in a barrel of flour. Only 70 per cent of the wheat is used in the flour, however, and the balance, or 30 per cent, goes into by-products. Therefore only 3.08 bushels of the farmers' product is used in a barrel of flour. Increasing the price of wheat 10 cents a bushel, the cost of a barrel of flour to the consumer is increased only a fraction over 30 cents, or if wheat is increased, as it should be, by 50 cents per bushel, the increase on a barrel of flour, or a year's supply for the individual, would be about $1.50. Yet 50 cents a bushel on the entire wheat crop would mean three hundred and seventy-five to four hundred millions of dollars to the wheat farmers of the United States, and thus increase their purchasing power by that amount.

When the loaf of bread is taken into consideration, the consumer again pays a price outrageously out of proportion to what the farmer receives for his wheat. Three hundred and thirty-four 1-pound loaves can be made from a barrel of flour.

AN INCREASE OF 10 CENTS PER BUSHEL WOULD MAKE LESS THAN ONE-TENTH OF A CENT INCREASE IN THE LOAF

In a recent issue of Labor, the official organ of the 16 standard railway brotherhoods, I find this statement, based on the Federal Trade Commission's findings on the cost of bread:

Three-quarters of the price of a loaf of bread goes to the baker and retailer. Less than one-seventh of the price goes to the farmer who grows the wheat.

These are outstanding facts in a report of the Federal Trade Commission on bread and flour industries just sent to the United States Senate.

For the latest three-year period available the price of bread in the United States, according to the commission, has averaged 8.55 cents per pound. This price was divided as follows:

	Cents
Farmer	1.15
Miller	.41
Baker	5.11
Grocer	1.28
Railroads, etc	.60

So that the grocer, merely for wrapping up the loaf and handing it over the counter, gets a noticeably larger share than the farmer gets for raising the wheat, and the baker gets more than four times as much as the farmer.

Mr. President, according to these figures, the work of the grocer and the baker is decidedly more profitable than that of the farmer.

No one contends that the pending McNary surplus control act is perfect, but it seems to be the best farm relief measure that can likely be agreed upon at this time. In all probability after it is put into operation amendments will be needed to make it more workable. Personally I believe it should carry a larger appropriation for the handling of the surplus products. There are also some other amendments that, to my mind, would greatly improve the bill. However, I am strongly for this measure, as I am convinced it is a step in the right direction and, if put into operation, will give the board a chance to test it out by actual experiment. If it does not accomplish what we believe and hope it will, amendments can be added from time to time which will improve it and make it a real farm relief measure and which will help to put farmers on a parity with those engaged in other lines of business.

Mr. President, the farmers of our Nation have been repeatedly promised favorable legislation. There is no doubt under the heavens but what they need it and are entitled to it. It is up to the United States Senate to do its part and pass this measure by a good majority.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I apologize to Senators who were sent for under a roll call which I protested. I know this is too fine a day for any Senator to stay in the Chamber; and, so far as I am concerned, I hope no Senator will. The fresh air will do them good. I advise the Vice President, also, to take a day off.

I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] for a moment. He knows the anxiety of the fruit and vegetable producers to be left out of this bill. I think that was the purpose of the committee in preparing the bill, although a section was added—section 6—apparently with particular reference to perishable agricultural commodities.

This bill could be amended in one of three ways: Either by inserting before the words "agricultural commodity" wherever they appear, the word "nonperishable," or by inserting on page 10 a proviso that it shall not apply to fruits or vegetables; or on page 26, after line 21, there could be inserted this language:

Section 14 provides that—

As used in this act—

And then I would have, after line 21:

(4) The words "agricultural commodity" mean an agricultural commodity which is nonperishable in its nature.

I realize that the committee, in formulating the bill, attempted to meet all the objections raised by the Executive. One of his complaints was that the old bill did not apply to all agricultural commodities. Of course, the effect here was to make the act apply to all commodities in order that this particular objection of the President might be met.

I think, however, that the same result could be accomplished by inserting, as I said, on page 26, in the general definitions, a statement that the words "agricultural commodity" mean an agricultural commodity which is nonperishable in its nature. Such a change would not upset the desire of the committee to have all agricultural commodities of a certain type included.

I hope I am not going too far in asking the Senator from Oregon if he will not include one of these three proposals as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the very capable Senator from New York was the first one to call my attention to the effects of the possible inclusion of vegetables in subdivision (b) of section 6. As stated by me in the preliminary discussion of the bill, the framers of the measure believed that the limitations on the board with respect to entering into marketing agreements wholly exempted the products about which the Senator now speaks; namely, perishable fruits and vegetables.

If the very distinguished Senator from New York will again read the language which specifies particularly that an article must be durable, must have keeping qualities, must be preservable, and adaptable to the theory of the bill which is involved in the marketing agreement—those being my words and not those of the bill—he will see that it was clearly the intention of the framers to exclude from the operation of the bill the commodities about which the Senator speaks.

However, that as a child runs it may read, I intend to follow the very helpful suggestion of the Senator from New York, namely, that in the manner that he shall fashion, if it conforms to my view, this bill shall be amended to exclude its operation upon those particular commodities.

The Senator in his wisdom has pointed out three ways in which that could be done, any one of which, perhaps, would be acceptable, but after I have a little time for further consideration I shall have no difficulty in coming to an agreement with him.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I appreciate very much the courtesy of the Senator and his zealous desire to cooperate.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I want to add to what the Senator from New York has said, that the apple-growing people of the Northwest, particularly of the State of Washington, are of the opinion that this bill as written might be applied to apples. I will not enter into the reasons why I think it would be entirely a mistake to have any possibility of apples being included in the bill, but I do want to join with the Senator from New York in urging that language shall be inserted so that there can be no doubt that apples are not included in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington need have no anxiety. We have the assurance of the Senator from Oregon, as we have had from the very beginning, that there was no intent on the part of the committee to include perishables. The committee is willing to have language written into the bill so that there shall be no mistake about it. Then there will be a certainty that fruits and vegetables and other perishable products are not included.

I am very glad the Senator from Oregon has been so generous, as he always is, because it makes it possible for me to enter enthusiastically into the support of this bill, as I have each time it has been before the Senate.

Sometimes I am joked a little bit about why a Senator from the State of New York, and particularly one living in the city of New York, should have an interest in the farm. As a matter of fact, New York State stands eleventh among the States of the Union in the value of its agricultural products. It is exceeded only by Texas because of its cotton, and California by reason of its citrus fruit production, by Iowa and Illinois on account of their corn, and it runs neck and neck with Kansas, Minnesota, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Wisconsin, and Ohio, being exceeded by any one of those States by not more than $25,000,000 in the value of its products. So it can be seen that New York is a great agricultural State, while it is ordinarily thought of as an industrial State, and the city of New York particularly as the financial center of the country.

As I view it, it is only reasonable for the farmers of this country to come before Congress and ask for relief. Why do I think so? We have but to study the history of industrial development in the United States to realize how the trusts, the combinations, and the protective tariff system came into existence.

Here is an example: The hatter in Danbury found himself, in the old days, in competition with the manufacturer of hats in Hartford. The Danbury hatter found that he was forced to sell his hats at a loss, or at a very small profit, because the Hartford man, perhaps because of better power, or from some other local condition, was able to make his product cheaper than the Danbury man could. So very soon there came into existence combinations. These men united, determined that they would fix the price and prevent cutthroat competition, which interfered with the prosperity of the hatters in all parts of the country.

I have given simply an example, but it indicates what was the beginning of the formation of combinations. It was not long, however, before these American institutions found that they were competing with the manufacturers of Europe. By reason of cheaper living conditions and lower-priced labor the manufacturers of Europe could make hats, for instance, very much cheaper than could the hatters of Danbury or Hartford.

In time these combinations gained political power. They came to Washington and succeeded in passing the various tariff acts, which have protected American labor and American industry against the cheap labor and the cheap institutions of Europe.

As I said a few moments ago, I am a tariff Democrat, and I have no fault to find with that economic situation and its solution. But there is no doubt that because of the tariff system the prices paid by the consumers of manufactured articles are very much higher than they would be if there should be free world competition.

We can not deny that, and we should face it. Every time a protective tariff act is passed, and every time a schedule is raised, it means that the people of the United States, the individual citizens, the buyers of this country are paying more for the things they buy.

The farmers of America, I am sorry to say, are chronic Republicans. No matter what happens, they vote the Republican ticket. They do that even in Michigan, I may say to the Presiding Officer [Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair].

The farmers of America, who are the great consumers of manufactured goods, are contributing very liberally to the prosperity of the industrial portions of this country. Everything a farmer buys, I do not care whether it is a crowbar or a chain or a pickax; no matter what he buys he pays more for it by reason of the tariff placed upon it. That is his contribution to the manufacturer, and to those who labor in the manufactories and to the industrial portion of our country.

That is not the only way the farmer suffers. He is the victim also of the combinations of labor. As I said, I have no fault to find with the protective tariff system, and I certainly have no fault to find with the labor unions. I can remember when I was a boy in Michigan the section hands working on the Michigan Central Railroad got a dollar a day. There was an old saying, "A dollar a day is darned poor pay"; but that is all they got, a dollar a day, and they worked 12 hours, 12 long, hard hours, for a dollar a day. A man started out in life as a laborer, and at the end of his short life he was a laborer, and his children were laborers. It was not until the labor union came into being and labor dealt collectively with its problems that labor had any chance to get any of the gravy of life. So I am glad that the labor union came into existence, and I have no fault to find with it.

We have to face the fact, however, that the farmer is the victim of the increased price paid to labor. When the farm boy looks about to see what he is going to do when he gets big enough, he does not stay on the farm. He is attracted by the high wages paid the carpenters, and the plumbers, and the other artisans in the city. He goes where he can get eight or ten or twelve dollars a day. The boys leave the farm. Consequently when the farmer wants to hire a man he is in competition with the city, he is in competition with the labor unions. So the farmer is always the victim. Whether it is the protective tariff system, or whether it is the fixing of the price of labor by the labor union, the farmer pays the bill.

Who are the consumers of this country? I told a story in the Senate—I think last year—about an old farmer who came into a drug store in New York and said to the proprietor of the drug store, "Are you interested in potatoes?" I do not know whether they were Idaho potatoes or not, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, but he wanted to know whether the druggist was interested in potatoes. The druggist said, "No; not if I can get enough to eat." The farmer said, "Is not anybody interested in potatoes?" The druggist said, "You might ask this girl at the soda-water fountain." She was in there getting a nut sundae, thinking it was a meal. He asked the girl, "Are you interested in potatoes?" She said, "No; I am a stenographer for a lawyer." He said, "Where is he?" She answered, "He is in the Equitable Building." The farmer went over to the lawyer in the Equitable Building and asked, "Are you interested in potatoes?" The lawyer laughed and said, "If I can get enough to eat; that is all." The farmer said, "Is not anybody interested in potatoes?" The lawyer said, "I am not. I am retained by the United States Steel Corporation. You might ask Judge Gary." The farmer said, "I will." So he went down and said, "Judge, are you interested in potatoes?" The judge laughed and said, "No; but wait a minute. You go over here and ask this man who makes manufactured steel. I sell him a lot of stuff. You ask him." The farmer went and said to the man, "Are you interested in potatoes?" He answered, "You bet your life I am. I make potato diggers!"

So if you go far enough, you will find that everybody is interested in the farmer.

I have spoken about the Steel Corporation. Last year they did not make so much, but the year before the United States Steel Corporation made $199,000,000 in profits, and the other steel corporations made money, all together two hundred and fifty or three hundred million dollars in profits.

Where is the steel sold? You see a great building going up with a structural steel frame and you think that is where the steel goes. You see the miles and miles of steel rails on the railroads and you think that is where the steel goes. You look at the locomotives and you think that is where the steel goes.

Mr. President, over half the manufactured steel sold in the United States is sold to the farmer for fence wire, agricultural implements, and all the many things they use upon the farm. Unless the farmers can buy the manufacturers of steel can not sell, and neither can other manufacturers.

I have said that the usual thought about New York City is that it is a great financial center. How often do you think about New York City as a manufacturing center? Yet the manufactured products of New York City in bulk and volume exceed the combined products in bulk and volume of Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Detroit, Buffalo, and Boston combined. That is, the great volume of materials turned out by the factories of the city.

We do not use those things. We sell them, and there can be no sale for the products of my city or of my State unless the farmers, who are the great consumers of manufactured products, have the money to buy.

Mr. President, have they the money? They have not. They have been in great distress, and there must be found a way to put them upon the same plane of economic equality with the industrial world and with those who labor with their hands.

We have heard a great deal in this Chamber this winter about unemployment, and the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] stands up in his place and attempts to prove to this body that the reason why there is so much unemployment is because invention has developed machinery, and no longer are things made by hand, but they are made by machinery. That is not the answer. The reason why there is unemployment in the cities is because the farmers can not buy the products made in the cities, because those who normally work in the city are without work.

In my city there are thousands upon thousands out of employment. Numbers in excess of the normal unemployment exist. How do I know it? I had a letter the other day from the head of one of the great district nursing institutions. She said:

I know you will be interested in what I have to say. We have 200 nurses making visits in the homes, going into thousands of homes. Never before in the history of this nursing institution has there been such suffering in the homes of New York City because of the unemployment.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BLEASE. Are those people American-born people?

Mr. COPELAND. Many of them are.

Mr. BLEASE. Is it not a fact that the reason why we have so much unemployment is that we have allowed foreigners to come in here and drive our people out of work?

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, Mr. President, I am not going to have any dispute with my distinguished friend, the Senator from South Carolina. In his State they have less than one-half of 1 per cent of foreign-born people. I can remember the figure for some reason or other. In my State we have a very much larger proportion of foreign born.

But I want to say to the Senator from South Carolina that we have no finer citizens, no more law-abiding citizens, no citizens who contribute more to philanthrophy and to the material progress of our city and our State. We have no citizens who are finer in their qualities of Americanism than those same citizens.

Of course, we have restricted immigration. The Senator from South Carolina need have no fear. I know the spirit of this body is such that there can be no extension of the boundaries for the admission of larger numbers. So, for myself, I am going to satisfy my conscience by trying to make those laws more humane, to bring together families, and not to continue these cruel separations which are imposed upon those who have become citizens—imposed by reason of the unjust and unfair, and, to my mind, unchristian laws which relate to immigration.

As I said, there is a tremendous amount of unemployment in in the city of New York, and it is unemployment due not to unrestricted immigration. We have not had that for years, but it is unemployment due to the fact that those who buy, the great farming groups of our country, are without means to buy, and there must be found a means of relief. I think that the Republican Party has much to answer for in its failure to listen to the farmers, but that party has not listened to them at all.

The President may perhaps veto the pending bill on the ground that it violates economic law. Of course it violates economic law. Anything that interferes with the law of supply and demand, with the free flow of things throughout the world, is uneconomic. But, Mr. President, is there anything more violative of economic law than the protective-tariff system? The very nature of the law, the very intent of the law, is to do away with the law of supply and demand. That is the purpose of it. It violates the first principles of economic law; but that is Republican doctrine.

I spoke a little while ago about the labor unions. When the labor unions fix the price of labor, that violates the economic law, but they do it to the advantage of those who labor, to the advantage of their families, to the advantage of their health and their lives, and I am glad that we have chosen to set aside the free operation of the law of economics as regards that particular thing.

So the McNary-Haugen bill violates economic law; but is it not time that we put all the people of the country upon the same plane of equality? We have permitted labor to violate the law of supply and demand; we have permitted industry, by the enactment of the tariff laws, to violate that natural law of supply and demand; and, as I see it, there can be no prosperity in the country until we have the farmer on the same plane of economic prosperity.

The bill is going to pass. I do not know just why the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] keeps it here until Tuesday. I suppose it is so that the Senator from New York and others may make speeches. But the bill should pass. We should permit the farmer to be taken care of.

We have a better bill than we had before. I congratulate the committee and I congratulate the chairman of the committee. With the amendment which the chairman of the committee has agreed to accept, I see no reason why we should not pass the bill and enact it into law. Then, if the President sees fit to veto the bill, that will make it very much easier for us to elect a Democratic President next fall, as we expect to do anyhow, and then we will have prosperity for the country anyway.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have felt impelled, very much, indeed, against my inclination, on two occasions heretofore to vote against bills in substance and general import like that now under consideration by the Senate. I say I have been driven to that course, because the indisputable facts of the case disclose that agriculture is suffering from an extraordinary combination of facts and circumstances and contending against conditions which have given rise to distress in that basic industry throughout the country.

We have heard much about the distress which has prevailed in the great western grain-growing sections. But it is not confined to that region by any means. A couple of very intelligent and interesting ladies from York, Pa., called on me the other day in relation to some business matters. They were apparently very well informed. The county in which they live they represented, and I have no doubt accurately, as having enjoyed for many years the reputation of being the richest agricultural county in the Union, and yet they told me that there are many farms for sale in that county at prices less than it cost to construct the buildings on the same.

The disparity between the prices of farm products and of other commodities, referred to so frequently in the debate upon these bills, persists. While there was some improvement in the situation in the fall of the year 1926, enough to permit partisan orators to assure the public that the difficulty was temporary and was passing away, there has been a recession since and it has gone back to the general level of about 80 per cent. That is to say, the products of the farm to-day will buy only about 80 per cent of commodities generally that they would buy in 1913. In other words, although the prices of farm products have advanced since 1913, the prices of other commodities generally have advanced so much more that a given quantity of the products of the farm which in 1913 would buy $100 worth of other commodities will now buy but 80 per cent of that quantity.

Nevertheless, I am unable to give my assent to the pending measure, and for the same reasons which impelled me heretofore to vote against its prototype. I am entirely satisfied that the bill, if it should become an act, would be unconstitutional and could never be enforced. I regret to say that the changes which have taken place in the bill have in no measure whatever removed the features which to my mind make it vulnerable to attack.

Much has been said about the unconstitutionality of the equalization feature of this and preceding bills of like character. But my objection to it never was based upon the equalization feature except as an incidental matter. I think the bill is unconstitutional because it offends against a very plain, simple proposition, namely, that the public funds can not be taken out of the Public Treasury, funds contributed by all the taxpayers, and turned over to a private individual or association of private individuals for the purpose of promoting their private business. That principle has been repeatedly determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I can find no reason to believe that the bill does not offend fatally against that principle. I have heretofore dilated upon that view and shall not now repeat the argument.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not desire in any way to interrupt the Senator from Montana in his very excellent speech; he has made very clear his opposition to the bill and the reasons therefor; but if his contention were carried to its logical conclusion, would it not prevent the Congress from appropriating money to take care of many of the activities engaged in by the Agricultural Department?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have said so heretofore. I dare say the same charge could be alleged against many of the appropriations that are found in the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a further question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. McNARY. Is the only offending department the Department of Agriculture, or does the same suggestion not necessarily apply to a great many other of the departmental activities of the Government?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not say as to that. I dare say that might be true. The trouble about it is that none of those matters can be attacked in any wise whatsoever; and that is where the feature of the equalization fee becomes important. It opens the door for attack. For instance, the maternity law by which Congress appropriated money, to be used conjointly with appropriations by the States, for the purpose of promoting the health of women in childbirth, was assailed upon the ground that it was an appropriation of money for a purpose not authorized by the Constitution. The State of Massachusetts brought a suit in the name of the people of that State, in order to give greater force to it, but the Supreme Court of the United States held that it was without jurisdiction to entertain a suit of that character, and the proceedings were dismissed. Accordingly, there was no way of determining the constitutionality of an appropriation of that character.

However, Mr. President, here is an opening for an attack, because in the pending bill the amount of the draft upon the revolving fund is to be reimbursed by an equalization fee, to be assessed upon the particular product or branch of agriculture that is aided by the appropriations from the revolving fund. Of course, the payment of that equalization fee will be resisted, and there will be presented the question of the validity of this proposed law. There is, as I think, no escape from that.

The difference is that this proposed act is open to attack, while the acts to which the Senator from Oregon has referred are not open to attack. Probably that does not make very much difference so far as the duty of a Member of Congress in the premises is concerned, but those acts do, as a matter of fact, go into effect and are enforced, whereas, to my mind, it will be impossible to enforce this proposed act.

Mr. President, bear in mind the principle upon which my opposition is based is, as I stated, the very simple one that funds which have been contributed by the general taxpayer can not be taken out of the Public Treasury, out of the Treasury of the United States, or out of the treasury of a State, or out of the treasury of a county, or out of the treasury of a city or of any other municipality and applied, either by way of gift or loan, for the promotion of a private enterprise.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I would be edified if the distinguished Senator and lawyer from Montana would distinguish for me the difference between taking money out of the Treasury and developing lands through reclamation by irrigation in Montana and other Western States and taking money out of the Treasury and loaning it to farmers in order that they may obtain better prices for their products.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I need not explain the difference to the Senator from Oregon, because there is no man in this body who better knows the difference between the cases than he. The taking of money out of the Public Treasury for the reclamation of arid land is justified and only justified upon the ground that the Government owns some of the land to be reclaimed, and it has a perfect right—indeed, a duty—to put that land in such a situation as that it can be disposed of and utilized. In order to do that it must likewise provide economically for the reclamation of the adjacent land held in private ownership.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Montana knows that that is not an answer at all, and so does the Senator from Oregon. I am not talking about a duty of the Government. The Senator from Montana is proceeding upon the theory that the Government has large areas of untaxed land; consequently there is a duty, moral or otherwise, resting on the Government to take its money and loan it to the settlers without interest and returnable in 40 years to the Treasury of the United States. That is still taxpayers' money taken out of the Treasury of the United Sates; so that in no sense is there a difference in principle at all. As to moral duty, I will discuss that question if I may have a minute further.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator at any time.

Mr. McNARY. The moral duty of the Government, through the appropriation of Federal money, is just as great in the case of the farmers, if it is necessary to put them on a plane of equality with other industries and labor which have been benefited by reason of legislation favorable to them as it is elsewhere. Hence, there is a moral duty in this connection, if we wish to occupy that position. The Senator is talking about abstract rules and the requirements of the Constitution. I myself have been curious to know, not only to-day but on earlier occasions, when the Federal Government is permitted, and has been permitted, to take from the Federal Treasury a sum in excess of $200,000,000 for loans to settlers in order to bring water from impounding dams high up in the mountains to the thirsty lands in the valley, the money to be returned to the Government in a period of 40 years, why that is not taking money from the Treasury in a similar and comparable way to the taking of money in this case. I am unable to appreciate the difference. In the case to which I refer the money was also returnable with interest and in a much shorter time. I challenge the great brain of the Senator from Montana, or, for that matter, anyone else who understands the problem of irrigation, to point out any difference between the two.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Oregon need only turn to the debates upon the reclamation bill of 1902 to learn the ground upon which the legislation was justified. It was justified upon the ground that the land to be reclaimed included public lands belonging to the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States was desirous of disposing of those lands and could not dispose of them in the condition which they then were; it could not dispose of them, at least it could not dispose of them to advantage at all or in pursuance of the policy which actuated the Government, unless those lands were improved by putting water upon them. In the work of putting water upon those lands it was required likewise to put water upon the adjacent lands held in private ownership. In other words, all of the lands that could be irrigated from the same source were taken into consideration. Accordingly, the Government, for the purpose of thus improving its own lands, undertook to advance out of funds in the General Treasury an amount necessary for the reclamation, the amount to be repaid. That was the basis upon which that legislation was founded. The Senator from Oregon knows that perfectly well.

Mr. McNARY. Certainly the Senator from Oregon knows that; but that is still away from the mark. That was the theory upon which the arguments proceeded, and I have no quarrel with it; but by a later and subsequent act of Congress it was provided that the Government should impound water and deliver it all to private owners of property in the vicinity; that is the law to-day, and for that purpose by act of Congress the sum of $20,000,000 has been expended.

I am merely endeavoring to make myself clear; I am only using this as an illustration to show, in my opinion, the inconsistency of the Senator's statement. I believe that both instances come within the function of Congress and do not in any way impinge upon the Constitution of our country.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not as yet learned of anybody who justifies the reclamation of lands held entirely in private ownership unless there was some other element involved.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As bearing upon the same point, I am reminded of the fact that during the last few years on one or two occasions Congress has appropriated five or ten million dollars for the purpose of buying seeds when farmers in the Northwest, by reason of drought or other catastrophe, were unable to purchase seeds for themselves, the provision of law being that the money should be repaid to the Government, and therefore the expenditure operating purely as a loan. Does the Senator make a distinction between that transaction and this bill which provides for a loan?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have that matter in mind, Mr. President. For that legislation there were many precedents. Quite a number of years ago Congress appropriated money to enable the people of Alexandria, who had suffered very severely because of fire, to rebuild; Congress has appropriated money for floods in the Ohio Valley; Congress has appropriated a large amount of money to help starving people in Europe. That is mere charity; it is confessedly beyond the Constitution. Nobody undertakes to defend it under the Constitution. It is just merely——

Mr. BARKLEY. Nobody, likewise, has opposed it on constitutional grounds.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the question never was raised, or, if it was, it was passed off sub silentio.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only difference between the transactions, so far as the Constitution is concerned, according to the Senator's contention, is the amount involved.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In a certain way that is correct, and yet, particularly in the case when we contributed to the relief of destitution in Europe—and possibly that action might also be justified as being part of the war program—it was a pure charity.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The life of the War Finance Corporation was extended subsequent to the war and after we had entered into a peace treaty, and the Government, through the War Finance Corporation, was authorized to loan and did loan millions of dollars to private corporations for the purpose of expediting the exportation of products to foreign countries. Does the Senator draw any analogy between that situation and this?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was just going to refer to that as a specific case in which money was appropriated for the promotion of private business. We passed the other day an act continuing the life of the War Finance Corporation for another year.

Of course that act was passed as a war act. It was passed confessedly under the war power, the limits of which no one has ever undertaken and probably never will undertake to define. No one ever thought of doing anything of the kind except in connection with the war. The whole justification for it was because of conditions arising out of the war that it was felt might be alleviated in that way and that were alleviated in that way.

If we were in a state of war, and this were a temporary measure to continue only during the war or for a reasonable time thereafter until war conditions had disappeared, I would not undertake to say that this legislation would not be entirely justified upon that ground.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is there any specific authority in the Constitution for doing that as a war measure that could not by analogy be translated into this situation, which is not a war measure but which is presumably for the welfare of the country?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think so, because when we speak about legislation enacted pursuant to the war power we mean legislation that could not be enacted except for the existence of a condition of war.

Mr. BARKLEY. But, so far as the Constitution itself provides, it makes no specific authorization for any particular kind of legislation necessary even in war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It simply says that Congress has power to declare war; and from that is evolved the power to make any provision necessary for the purpose of bringing the war to a successful termination.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. GOODING. The Senator will agree that if it had not been for the World War this legislation would not be necessary at all?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not agree to that.

Mr. GOODING. The Senator does not agree to that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I do not agree to it at all. Indeed, Mr. President, the reports of all of the committees indicate that this disparity of prices which it is the purpose of this legislation to overcome, at least in part, is attributable to various legislation of Congress: First, to the tariff; second, to railroad legislation; third, to the Adamson law; fourth, to the immigration law. It is said in all of the reports that this disparity between the prices of farm products and other commodities is attributable chiefly to this legislation of the Congress, and therefore that Congress ought now to legislate in order to overcome that disparity; and I agree to that.

Mr. GOODING. But agriculture could adjust itself to a tariff. We have had a protective tariff, off and on, for a hundred years; but we had an economic relationship between the industries, disturbed only by the war itself—not intentionally, of course, as far as legislation was concerned—but the fruit of the war was the destruction of agriculture.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am trying to tell the Senator what the advocates of this bill claim, and I agree to that—that this disparity is due to these causes. The Senator can turn to the reports; he has concurred in them, and has told us that that is the reason for this disparity.

Mr. GOODING. I agree to that in part; but, at the same time, the great change that was brought upon this country and the world was due to the World War. It changed the map of the world; it changed conditions in every country on earth; it brought about in this country the highest standards that civilization has ever known. The farmer is not able to meet those changed conditions, because he can not pass on his increased cost; that is all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desire to say, with respect to that, that no one heretofore has even suggested that this bill is now before us pursuant to the war power of Congress.

Mr. GOODING. I have. In my remarks I have very fully discussed it from that standpoint. There is not any doubt, if we study the legislation passed during the war, that that legislation was responsible for the condition and the great loss of agriculture. It was not passed intentionally, of course, to injure agriculture, but of necessity it was owing to the World War.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That condition may be, and I dare say is in some measure, attributable to the war which came to an end nearly 10 years ago; but to institute new legislation 10 years after a war upon the war power seems to me scarcely appropriate.

Mr. GOODING. Ah, but it fixed a standard which has not been broken down, but maintained—a standard which the farmer has to meet, and which he can not pass on—and there lies the danger to agriculture.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not desire to detain the Senator; but when we took over the railroads as the result of the war we guaranteed that their income should be an average for a certain period of three years. We also guaranteed that we would return them to their owners in as good condition as when they were taken over; and the Government complied with that guarantee.

In addition to that, in the transportation act we provided that the Government might loan these railroads large sums of money, which was done. Having guaranteed their income during the war and having complied with that guaranty, having agreed to put them back in as good condition as they were when we took them over and having complied with that agreement, does the Senator contend that the loaning of money to the railroads in addition to that was in pursuance of the war power of the Government?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator introduced that subject.

The legislation in relation to the railroads had no relation whatever to the war power. It is indisputable that Congress may loan money, that the State may loan money unless restrained by its constitution, that the county may loan money, for the construction of railroads or for the prosecution of the railroad business. That is clearly established by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and that upon the ground that these are instrumentalities affected with a public use. It was long ago settled that a railroad is subject to the command of the public. Everybody can use it. The railroad company can not deny the use of it to anyone desiring to make use of the facilities which it affords, and therefore it is said to be affected with a public use.

Bear in mind I am not defending the legislation of 1920 in relation to the railroads, nor any feature of it. I merely say that, quite independent of the war, in my judgment, it was entirely within the power of Congress to vote any amount of money to the railroads. Why, away back in 1864 Congress made liberal grants, excessive grants, for the construction of railroads across the country. They loaned a large amount of money to the Union Pacific Railroad Co. and took a mortgage upon the property for it. There is not any doubt at all about that power of Congress. That, however, is altogether different from a purely private business.

A man owns a farm. He can do what he pleases with it. I can not occupy it. I can not insist that he sell his products to me. He can do as he pleases with it. It is his own private property, affected with no public use at all. That kind of business the public can not be taxed to sustain.

However, Mr. President, I did not rise to convince anybody. At the same time I am perfectly willing to expound my views in answer to any questions that are asked.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire to add one observation. I quite agree with the Senator's discussion of the transportation problem. It is a very different one. I am still unconvinced, however, and perhaps must be content with not being convinced, that the irrigation of private property owned by a settler is not exactly the same, having the same right to dispose of loss and gain as the one carried by this bill; but I do not care to pursue that at all. It is profitless. I have my own conviction and my own judgment on that matter, and I will not surrender it. It is quite unimportant what that view is; but I want to see how far the Senator would go on this thing.

Recently I presented on the floor of the Senate a $10,000,000 program for the control of the corn borer in the New England States and along the Lakes, which was passed. I suppose that was unconstitutional?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator think so?

Mr. McNARY. I am asking the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh! I do not know.

Mr. McNARY. I supposed the Senator would know.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know. I would not undertake to say whether it was or not, because I have not given any study to it.

Mr. McNARY. It was an appropriation of funds, $10,000,000 in total, passed by this body and concurred in by the House, whereby this money was to be used to control the corn borer, which was doing damage on privately owned farms to privately owned corn.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but the Senator will bear in mind that the same corn borer, like the boll weevil, may not confine his operations to the particular locality in which he now is, but may spread over the entire country.

Mr. McNARY. Then the Senator, I assume, would say that he is placing his argument now upon the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. McNARY. And I assume that the same argument might apply when, at a later date, I offered here for the consideration of this body a bill carrying $40,000,000 to acquire cut-over and denuded and forested areas on the watersheds of navigable streams. I assume that that is placed upon the constitutional provision providing for navigation and commerce.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It has been so defended upon the floor of the Senate here.

Mr. McNARY. I think I made that defense myself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. The Senator each time finds some warrant in the Constitution for any of these appropriations——

Mr. McNARY. Not always.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And generally it is sound. I agree with the Senator; not always.

Mr. McNARY. But in the case of this particular bill, which seeks to aid a great basic industry which all admit is in distress, the Senator challenges the power of Congress to loan money to better the condition of the industry. I do not challenge it; but, if I did, I would say that Congress could not appropriate money to the Senator in Montana to bring water down upon his privately owned property, upon which he pays taxes and has a mortgage, to which the Government has no right and over which it has no control.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I agree with the Senator, except that at the same time the Government is bringing down water for its property.

Mr. McNARY. In 17 arid Western States; that is true. Consequently, I do not understand the position of the Senator when he decries the use of money for this purpose, and votes for it for another and similar purpose. The Senator no doubt considers that he has made himself clear, but I am left in the same amazement as when I initiated my remarks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should be very glad to be convinced by the Senator that there is no difference between this bill and a reclamation bill; but I find a perfect justification for the reclamation law, and I do not for this.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one other question along the same line?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the difference between appropriating money to stop the ravages of the tobacco worm, so that he will not chew up all the tobacco before man gets a chance at it, and loaning the money to the grower of that tobacco to enable him to market it after he has been able by Government appropriation to save it from the tobacco worm?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think there is a very great difference in principle. I would not undertake to discuss now the question of the constitutionality of that particular appropriation.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is less hazard, as far as the expenditure of the money is concerned, from the loan than from the gift.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Unfortunately the authorities do not make any difference in the matter of hazard. The decisions of the Supreme Court in the matter say that you can not do it, no matter how well guarded the thing is.

For instance, one of the cases concerned a statute which authorized a municipality to loan its credit for the establishment of a beet-sugar factory in the immediate vicinity of the city. The sugar factory was issuing its bonds. The bonds seemed to be perfectly good. The security offered by the company was ample in its plant, in its business, and all that kind of thing; and there did not seem to be any great likelihood that the city would ever be called upon to make good its guaranty of those bonds. Some private citizen, some taxpayer, intervened, however, and had the city enjoined from making the guaranty, upon the ground to which I referred. It is not a question as to whether the risk is great, or whether the risk is small; the power is lacking.

However, as I said, I did not rise to convince anybody. My conviction is that the payment of the equalization fee will be resisted by some one, and thereupon a test of the constitutionality of this act will arise.

I rose to say that it has been a matter of surprise to me that the farm organizations of the country have spent so much time and energy in the advocacy of this measure, in the pursuit as I think of a losing game, when there is an opportunity to render what I regard as a very great benefit to the farmer by the prosecution of a project that would go very far toward obliterating this disparity which has been spoken of between the prices of farm products and the prices of other commodities.

I refer to the proposal to improve the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, so that ocean-going vessels may load cargo at Duluth or Chicago and proceed uninterruptedly to any place touched by the seven seas; in other words, to move the seaboard inward a distance of a thousand miles to make Duluth, Chicago, Milwaukee, and Detroit ocean ports.

In the year 1919 the International Joint Commission was, by act of Congress, concurred in by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, directed to inquire into the feasibility and the cost of this project. It affects a vast territory, partially indicated on the map which is on the wall. It is of immediate and prime consequence to 40,000,000 people, all those whose products find an outlet through any of the lake ports, not only of States bordering upon the Lakes, but those to the westward as far as the summit of the Rocky Mountains on the west and south as far as Kansas City, and even Fort Worth, Tex. It is of immediate consequence to 22 different States, whose freight rates would be reduced by this project.

It costs now to transport a hundredweight of grain from my home, the city of Helena, to the terminal market at Minneapolis 44½ cents. In 1913 the rate was 32 cents. In 1920 it was 50½ cents. In other words, out of every hundredweight of grain shipped from Helena, Mont., to any of the eastern markets or to Europe 44½ cents must be taken out for freight.

If any man should propose a reduction of 10 cents a bushel in the transport of wheat from any of the regions west of the Lakes to the terminal markets he would be regarded as a public benefactor, he would be praised in every household in that region occupied by 40,000,000 people.

It is proposed to improve that highway so that the cost of the transport of grain from Duluth to north European ports would be reduced by 10 cents a bushel. At the present time ships drawing no more than 14 feet can make the trip through the St. Lawrence and the Welland Canal. It is proposed to so improve the St. Lawrence River between Lake Ontario and Montreal as to permit the passage of ships of at least 25 feet draft. The Welland Canal now admits the passage of ships of only 14 feet draft, and ships of such small size can not engage profitably in the overseas trade. Eighty-eight per cent of all the ships engaged in the overseas trade draw 25 feet or less. In other words, 88 per cent of all the ships engaged in the overseas trade would be able to make the passage to the remote lake points to which I have referred, and that includes practically all of the freight-carrying vessels.

In 1919 the International Joint Commission was directed to inquire into the feasibility and cost of this waterway. They were aided in their investigation by a board of engineers, appointed by the Government of Canada and by the United States, the United States branch being headed by Col. W. P. Wooten, of the Corps of Engineers of the Army, and the Canadian branch by Mr. W. A. Bowden, then chief engineer of the department of railways and canals for the Canadian Government.

That commission reported in the year 1922 to the effect that the project was entirely feasible, and demanded by the economic conditions throughout that entire region. The board of engineers, however, recommended that a further study be made, with a view to determining the particular plan which should be adopted for the improvement of that route.

It may be of interest to know that it is 625 miles shorter by the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route to Liverpool or Hamburg than it is by way of New York.

Pursuant to the recommendation of the commission, reporting in 1922, which was concurred in by both the American and Canadian members of the commission, another commission was created, the American division being headed by the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Herbert Hoover, and the Canadian division by the Hon. George P. Graham, the minister of railways and canals. It likewise had the aid of a corps of engineers, the American members of the corps being Gen. Edgar Jadwin, Col. William Kelly, and Col. George B. Pillsbury, the Canadians appointing Mr. Duncan McLachlan, Minister of Railways and Canals; Mr. Olivier LeFevre, chief of engineers of the Quebec Streams Commission; and Brig. Gen. Charles Hamilton Mitchell. That commission, so far as the American branch was concerned, reported about a year ago, again reporting favorably upon the project, and recommending the initiation of the work of preparation. The Canadian commission reported in the month of January last. The report has not been made public, but press reports indicate that it likewise is favorable to the immediate undertaking of this work. It might be said, however, that again the board of engineers concurred substantially in the recommendation which was made to undertake the work.

The St. Lawrence River forms, in part, the boundary between the United States and Canada, and in part is entirely within the Dominion of Canada. It constantly becomes and is an international stream, so the work must be undertaken by the joint action of the two Governments. Some time ago the Department of State communicated with the Canadian Government, suggesting a meeting for the purpose of drafting a treaty looking to the prosecution of the work, and that matter is now held in abeyance.

It is asserted by the commission that this project, if carried out, would reduce the cost of transporting grain, as I have heretofore stated, from all of this region affected, to the north European ports, at least 10 cents per hundredweight, and it is said that the advantages accruing to the farmers of the section involved would be so great as annually to meet the entire cost of the work.

It is contemplated that not only will the interest of navigation be subserved, but there is a potential power development between Lake Ontario and the city of Montreal of something like 5,000,000 horsepower, something over two and a half million to be developed in the international section of the river, and the remainder in the section entirely within Canada. The commission, however, reports that at the present time there is not a market for any more of this power than that which can be developed in the international section of the river, amounting to something like 2,700,000.

It is estimated that the cost of the work which will be carried on chiefly in the river will be $394,000,000 in a single-stage development, or $426,000,000 in a two-stage development; that is to say, in a certain section of the river if there are two pools instead of one. But the amount of the expenditure to be allocated to the development of power will be such as to reduce the cost allocable to the purposes of navigation to something like $123,000,000 if one plan of development is pursued, or $148,000,000 if another plan of development is pursued. That is to say, the net cost of the project will be in the one case $123,000,000 and in the other case $148,000,000.

What does that mean? We export annually something like 250,000,000 bushels of wheat or its equivalent in flour. It is in testimony, by men long engaged in the export grain business, that by this route the cost of transporting grain, as I said, will be reduced by 8 to 10 cents per hundred pounds. That means a saving in actual freight rates on outgoing freight, on flour or wheat alone, of something between $20,000,000,000 and $25,000,000,000, which, capitalized at 4 per cent, means, of course, something like $500,000,000. In other words, the charges for the carriage of grain in export would be equal to the interest upon an expenditure of $500,000,000, to say nothing whatever about what will be derived from power development, which it is contemplated will be incidental to the work in the improvement of navigation.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator think that that would help the wheat farmers of Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I stated, before the Senator returned to the Chamber a moment ago, that if I were only able to assure the people of Montana, who pay 44 cents per hundred for the transport of their wheat from Helena to Minneapolis, of a reduction in the cost of 10 cents per hundred pounds—indeed, more than that; 14 cents a hundred—they would erect a statue to me in every city in the State.

Mr. COPELAND. Before they do that let the people of Montana know that the rate from Saskatchewan and Alberta to the lake head is 26 cents, while from Montana to the lake head it is 44½ cents. In other words, there is a differential of 18 cents, and it can never be overcome. Of course, this is not the time to argue it, but I can not see, from the study I have given the subject, that the building of the St. Lawrence Canal can do anything except help Canada, and it will be of no help to the wheat growers of the State of Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The disparity will exist if the waterway is constructed, just exactly as it does now. The view of the Senator may be very sound, but it does not agree at all with the views of the American commissioners or the Canadian commissioners, who have twice studied the particular subject. The disparity of which the Senator speaks is a matter that has troubled us for many years. When the Canadian Pacific was organized over in Canada the wise statesmen of that day and that country put a provision in the charter which limited the price which could be charged for the transportation of grain from the western fields to the eastern terminals. Our statesmen did not make a similar provision in our charter. It is in the Canadian charter. We can not get rid of it.

I have given attention to that matter. Not many years ago I made application for the Railroad Commission of the State of Montana to the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce the rate for the transport of wheat from Montana points to Duluth and Minneapolis.

I made an interesting comparison with rates on the other side of the line, and I thought I had a case, but I was immediately advised, when I went to study the matter, that the situation was altogether different. They have a charter rate there, and the other Canadian roads are obliged to meet the rates of the Canadian Pacific. So there is an advantage there in the Canadian Northwest, no matter what we do.

We can not get rid of that differential, but the differential will not make a bit of difference. They will get their wheat, then, to the head of the lake cheaper than we can get our wheat to the head of the lake, just exactly the same as they do now. The cost of transporting that wheat will be reduced by the amount we save upon the transportation from the head of the lake to the European points, and they will get exactly the same advantage, but the same disparity will exist. The situation will not be changed in any degree whatever.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, the Senator and his constituents in Montana are at a disadvantage in the matter of freight rates because of the nationally owned roads in Canada. They are transporting wheat regardless of what it actually costs to do it, and year before last had a loss of $63,000,000 in the operation of those railroads. But the practical effect of all this has been that where the United States has increased its acreage of wheat in 20 years by only 5,000,000 acres, Canada has trebled hers. Where she had 8,000,000 acres 20 years ago, to-day she has 25,000,000 acres.

I dislike even to be this sort of a prophet, but I am here to say that the American wheat farmer is going to be more and more at a disadvantage. The Canadian wheat farmer is going to reap the advantage, not alone of conditions which are physical, but because blood is thicker than water. The fact is that the English would rather buy from the Canadians than from us. I doubt exceedingly if by the building of this canal the wheat farmers of Montana and other sections of the West in our country are going to be materially benefited.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The relative situation is not changed in the slightest degree by this improvement, but I might say, while I am talking about this matter, that I am not surprised by the attitude taken by the Senator from New York with respect to it. He speaks the attitude of his State. Twenty-two States bordering upon the Great Lakes or marketing their products through the ports of the Great Lakes, have appealed for the institution of this work—every one except the State of New York, which appeared officially before the commission, appointed in 1921, protesting against this improvement. I do not suppose the people of New York are any more selfish than people are anywhere else, but of course they want all this great traffic to go through the port of New York. They fear the diversion of it to the other route. There is no question about that proposition at all. They were very frank about it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator bear with me again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. How does the Senator from Montana imagine that a six months' service or seven months' service is going to be of any benefit—because that is all there will be on the St. Lawrence? How is such a route going to be capable of establishing a permanent freight service? If the Senator had ever been over the St. Lawrence River, as I have—I went twice to Europe by that route—he would find that he could not go through the Straits of Belle Isle until along about the 4th of July. He would find the fog makes the route almost impassable. In consequence, there will be about a six months' service. It is not possible to build up a service there that will be a successful service.

Furthermore, it will be a one-way service. What will they bring back in shipload lots from Europe that will go up that river? The people in the West have an idea they are going to tie the Leviathan up at the dock in Chicago and that she will land at Milwaukee, which, of course, is a perfectly absurd proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me correct the Senator. Nobody imagines the Leviathan can go up there. Moreover, all of the suggestions now made by the Senator were made by the representatives of the city of New York before the commission, and the commission have answered every one of them. The answers are in the report. The matter of fog, the matter of six months' service, the matter of freight back—all of those suggestions were made by representatives of the city of New York in protest against this improvement, and are twice answered by a unanimous vote of the board of engineers, and twice answered by the unanimous vote of the commissioners of both countries.

Mr. COPELAND. The engineers also said that the New York route is a perfectly feasible route, but would cost more money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to say something about that. There are two alternative routes proposed which are of course approved by the State of New York, one to follow the Ontario-Hudson route, which would go across the State to the Hudson River, and another one, the so-called American route, going from Buffalo across. Both of those routes would cost something over $600,000,000 as against, in round figures, $400,000,000 for the other. Neither of them would offer any reduction at all on account of the development of power. The whole $600,000,000 would be just so much spent, as against $123,000,000 or $148,000,000 net for the St. Lawrence route. They would offer no power development at all. Moreover, the cost of maintaining them, according to the report of the commissioners, would be greatly in excess of the cost of maintaining the other route. In addition to that there would be something like two or three times as many bridges to cross, so that navigation would be impeded.

Moreover, now that the Senator from New York is talking about the inclement winter season when the ice would prevent the utilization of this route, let me state that exactly the same conditions would apply to either of the New York routes. They would be frozen up in winter.

Mr. COPELAND. Our way is not quite so bad, because the New York route would not have the embarrassment of the fog, and it is 1,700 miles from the end of Lake Ontario to the ocean. In consequence there could be no intercoastal service.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Montreal is the second city on the western continent in the matter of its foreign trade.

Mr. COPELAND. And after this canal is built it will be the first.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is next to the city of New York, and that trade must encounter all the fogs of which the Senator tells us.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; of course, it does, but as an American, and regardless of whether I live in New York or live somewhere else, I am not going to vote money to build up the port of Montreal and make it the great transshipment point of this continent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is good. The only opposition there is in Canada of any consequence at all comes from the city of Montreal, which insists that its transshipment system will be ruined by this improvement.

Mr. COPELAND. And the reason why is because the people of Montreal want to go by the Ottawa-Lake Nipissing-French River route. They want to reach the Great Lakes by the other route, which goes off to the north across to the Georgian Bay. In that way they would corral the whole shipping business.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And the commissioners disapproved of that. Both the American and the Canadian commissioners disapproved of it and said that it is an impracticable route.

Mr. COPELAND. Nevertheless the city of Montreal is playing its game and Canada is playing its game, and so far as I am concerned, as an American, I am still for the American canal, in spite of the eloquence of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would take traffic from the city of New York, and that is the reason for the Senator's attitude. The trouble about the argument of the Senator is that the city of Montreal is the one obstacle in the way of the speedy negotiation of a treaty with Canada in relation to this matter.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I thought that this bill was a bill for the agricultural relief of the people of the United States generally. I had not supposed that it was simply a bill for the regional relief of only a part of the United States. It is natural enough for the Senator from Montana to take the attitude he does, because he is particularly interested in the portion of the country where he resides, but the rest of us are perhaps as much interested in the prosperity of the portions of the country where we reside. I can not see that the alternative suggested by the Senator contemplates anything in the nature of general agricultural relief throughout the country.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right about that.

Mr. BRUCE. A few days ago there was a large delegation here from the cities of Boston, New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Norfolk complaining bitterly because of the ever-growing importance of the city of Montreal as a port of export as compared with those cities. It looks to me as if the Senator is simply going to aggravate that situation and to promote Canadian interests at the expense of the interests of the people of the United States. My hope was that we might have some great outlet to the sea that would be of vast benefit to our own territory, such as I imagine the Senator from New York has in mind.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from New York likewise was afraid that this would develop extraordinarily the export trade of the city of Montreal, but I was calling attention to the fact that the city of Montreal joins the city of New York in opposing it.

Mr. BRUCE. The idea of the Senator from New York was also the idea of the delegation from our Atlantic seaboard ports that came here the other day at the instance of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and gathered together in the conference here, to which all of us who happened to represent those ports were invited. It was the view of that assemblage of merchants, exporters, representatives of chambers of commerce and boards of trade, and what not. The belief of all of them was that we should take steps to counteract the rapidity with which Montreal is becoming the greatest port of export in this hemisphere, and, of course, incidentally at the expense of New York, in the prosperity of which the Senator from New York so well says that all Americans are deeply interested.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator is apprehensive about the future of the city of Montreal, let me remind him that the city of Montreal is equally apprehensive about its future in view of this particular project. Accordingly, I should expect that the Senator from Maryland would be very cheerfully aiding us in prosecuting this project, so that the future of the city of Montreal should not be imperiled.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, this is the first time that anything in the nature of uneasiness on the part of the port of Montreal has ever been brought to my attention. Its attitude, so far as I could gather at the meeting to which I have referred, was one rather of exultant triumph at the thought that it is going forward all the time at the expense of the city of New York and our other Atlantic seaports. As the Senator from New York says—my suspicion might not stand the test of searching examination—Montreal has another interior waterway than the St. Lawrence waterway up its sleeve.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no; they object to this particular waterway, because they fear that it will interfere with Montreal as a port of transshipment, and that is their testimony before the commission.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator wants to be fair about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. The fact is that Montreal does not want the St. Lawrence developed for the reason, as I have said, that they want the shorter route through the Georgian Bay, which is exclusively in Canadian territory. In the next place, they do not want the water power developed on the St. Lawrence under such a scheme as is proposed, because it would mean the development of large manufactories in the State of New York, which they do not want.

They want all such development to be in their own country.

There is not any use talking about the great service that such a canal would render the United States. It would not render it. Ninety per cent of the service now through Montreal is eastbound. There is not anything to be brought back. The only end the canal could serve would be to take wheat and flour to Europe.

As the Senator from Maryland has well said, if the Senator will bear with me a moment longer, we are to-day exporting through the port of Montreal 90,000,000 bushels of American wheat, and are exporting only 39,000,000 bushels through American ports. The port of New York has no particular grievance; it is taking most of that; but the port of Baltimore, the port of Philadelphia, the port of Boston, and the port of Portland, Me., are practically ruined as exporting points for American grain.

Mr. BRUCE. And also the port of Norfolk.

Mr. COPELAND. And the port of Norfolk, as well. That is what is happening to us.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is neither here nor there. The fact is that the city of Montreal is opposing the project, according to the report of the commission—there is not any guess about it, but that is their position according to the testimony before the commission—because they think it will interfere with their export trade. That trade, as a matter of course, is a transshipment trade. The cargoes come in in small vessels, and are loaded on vessels of deep draft at Montreal. If the canal should be completed, they would not stop at Montreal, but would go on from Chicago and Duluth to Hamburg and Liverpool.

Mr. COPELAND. What would they bring back from Liverpool and Hamburg?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. That is a vast region; it is one of the great consumptive regions of America. Where do the imports from Europe go now? They go all through this region here [indicating on the map]. This [indicating] is one of the great consuming sections of the country, and, of course, the commodities will come very much cheaper by the water route than they will by rail. The same European products that now go to the Atlantic seaboard here [indicating] and to the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and eventually find their ultimate destination in this territory [indicating] will come by this route here [indicating] and find their destination there. That is what the ships will carry coming back.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Moreover, if the Senator will pardon me, I will give him the figures of both the incoming and outgoing carriage as computed by the commission. I thought I had the figures conveniently at hand.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I can tell the Senator that 90 per cent of the traffic through Montreal is eastbound; and it is absurd, if the Senator will permit me to say so, to think that we could bring shiploads of stuff from Europe through the proposed canal and through the Great Lakes.

That is not the way it is done. It is package freight; there has to be a transshipment at tidewater, and the first place is Montreal. So if the Senator cares to put it on New York, I am glad to take it, because I am for my State first. Instead of having the transshipment of this package freight at New York or at Baltimore or at Boston or Portland or Norfolk or Philadelphia, the transshipment would be at Montreal, and Canada would be benefited by it. So far as I am concerned, whether I represent the State of New York or not, I am here to say I am never going to vote any American money with which to build a canal in the St. Lawrence River to build up the British Empire and the great Dominion of Canada.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, as to the absurdity of the contention made by the Senator from Montana, the Senator from New York will have to fight that out with the commission. His judgment about it may be better than the judgment and the figures of the two commissions which have made a particular study of this subject. Some of us, however, may be pardoned for doubting the completeness of the information of the Senator or the soundness of his judgment as compared with either of those commissions. I hope that I shall be able, however, to give the Senator information about the incoming and outgoing freight from Montreal. I find, however, I have not at the moment got it at hand.

Mr. COPELAND. The soundness of the judgment of the Senator from New York may be at fault, but I have some information on the subject. So far as I am concerned, I am convinced that the St. Lawrence Canal plan is a hydroelectric water-power plan, and I notice that the most enthusiastic advocate of it is Mr. Herbert Hoover. I want a canal that will serve the United States of America, and, incidentally, if the canal should pass through my State it would not be bad for New York, and I am not going to haul down my flag on that account.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad to have the assurance from the Senator from New York that we will not have the opposition of the water-power interests in this matter. It is really the only serious obstacle in the way of the carrying out of this project.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course; because they want to develop it privately.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The water-power interests have been after it for a long time, but, thanks to the good people of the State of New York, they have not got it as yet.

Mr. COPELAND. And thanks to the Governor of the State of New York, Mr. Smith, they have not got it as yet.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, I do not know how the Governor of the State of New York can grant away the right to create water power in a navigable stream; but perhaps he can. He is a rather powerful man, I know.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator from Montana doubt that the water power on the St. Lawrence, so far as it is an international boundary, is the property of the State of New York, and of the Province of Ontario?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is the property of the people of the United States, if it can be spoken of as property at all. So far as the international boundary is concerned, I do not think that there is any room for controversy that a navigable stream constituting a boundary between this country and a foreign country is, as everybody will concede, under the control of the Federal Government.

Mr. COPELAND. It is interesting to note, however, that the governor of my State, single-handed and alone, has made his fight against the private water-power interests who want that power to be put into the hands of private concerns. If I knew of nothing else in the career of Governor Smith than that one thing, I would think that he deserved the applause of the Nation, just as the Senator from Montana does for what he has done in forestalling those interests.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. I want it developed by the Federal Government, in conjunction with the Dominion of Canada, so that it will not fall into the hands of private interests. That is enough for that. Private interests have been after it for a long time.

The Senator from Maryland is quite right, that this project will afford no particular relief to agriculture in his State or in the State of Pennsylvania, in which, as I said a while ago, some relief is needed as well as in the West. I do not offer it, Mr. President, as a complete solution of the entire situation. I offer it as a means of relieving agriculture in a great section of the country. That it does not reach to every section is undoubtedly true, but this also is true, that to whatever extent the cost of transporting grain from the West to European ports is reduced the price of grain everywhere in the United States is appreciated approximately to that extent. I think that if a moiety of the energy that has been expended by the farmers of the great western region had been devoted to the exploitation of this particular project it would probably be well on the way by this time, and it would have afforded relief upon perfectly economic grounds. However, this matter will probably be presented in a more direct way to the Congress later on.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas and Mr. BRUCE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas, who, I think, was first on his feet.

Mr. BRUCE. I thought the Senator from Montana had yielded the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator a question, not with reference to the subject which the Senator has most recently been discussing but with particular reference to a phase of his remarks which was under discussion some time ago. I wish to ask him what he understands to be the limitation in the Constitution on the power of Congress to appropriate public money?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Well, it is difficult to answer that question. It must be for some purpose with respect to which Congress is authorized by the Constitution either expressly or impliedly to legislate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The subject is, of course, associated with some difficulty, and I do not intend to attempt to discuss it now, but the Senator has raised a very important question. As I understand him, he says that the appropriation of public moneys authorized by the so-called McNary-Haugen bill is in violation of the Constitution. I merely take occasion now to say that my understanding of the matter is that the power of appropriation in Congress is practically unlimited. It has been held by the courts that once Congress authorizes an appropriation, even though it be for a private in contradistinction to a public purpose, the appropriation is valid, and neither a court nor an executive officer can question the right of appropriation.

I think Mr. Monroe first discussed in a very illuminating way that subject. He entertained in the beginning the viewpoint which is implied in the argument of the Senator from Montana, but my impression is that in a very exhaustive writing on the question he reached the conclusion that Congress may appropriate the public moneys for purposes over which it has no control whatever; and I think the courts have held that Congress may even appropriate public moneys for private purposes. Of course that has no relation to the question of the merits of the measure. It has, however, relation to the power of Congress to make the appropriation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I suppose, of course, the Senator from Arkansas refers to the very earnest discussion in Mr. Monroe's time concerning appropriations for works of internal improvement. That arose in connection with the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal, and with the great highway proposed to be constructed to connect the tidewater region with the valley of the Ohio; but that was justified upon the ground that it was the providing of a highway for interstate commerce, just exactly the same as the provisions made for forwarding the construction of transcontinental railroads.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have not had an opportunity to examine the precedents recently; but I think the Senator will find that under their present state Congress can appropriate money for any purpose that it chooses, the only limitation on its power of appropriation being the consciences of the Members of the two Houses of Congress; and, of course, that is not a legal limitation. It is a moral one.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but in this particular case the revolving fund is to be made up by contributions exacted by the equalization fee; and the question is presented, of course, as to whether Congress can exact that equalization fee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; the question arises as to whether that constitutes a regulation of commerce.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is an entirely different question from the one I was presenting.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The point I am making with respect to that—perhaps the Senator did not follow it—is that the right of Congress to make the appropriation will be tested out and tried in an effort to collect the equalization fee; that is, the question of the constitutionality of the entire legislation will be raised in a proceeding of that character.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator does not raise any question, then, as to the power of Congress to provide a revolving fund?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I do raise that question, and I say that ordinarily it can not be attacked. We have made many appropriations that could not possibly be attacked; but this bill affords an avenue by which an attack on the particular appropriation can be made.

GEORGE WASHINGTON MEMORIAL BUILDING

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, there is nothing in which I find such a high degree of satisfaction in connection with my brief career in this body as the fact that the amendment to the public buildings bill of a year or so ago which resulted in the splendid scheme of public improvements that is now being carried out south of Pennsylvania Avenue, in this city, was offered by me.

A very timely supplement to this scheme of improvements, which will ultimately perhaps involve the expenditure of as much as $150,000,000, is the George Washington Memorial Building that is in contemplation of erection by the George Washington Memorial Building Association. That building is to be erected on land that has been given for the purpose by the Government at B and Seventh Streets in Washington, and its foundations have already been laid. At this time the association is actively engaged in collecting funds that will be needed for the purpose of completing it; and it is computed that perhaps a total of some $6,000,000 will be required to consummate the plans of the association.

I rise simply for the purpose of having inserted in the RECORD three brief leaflets of the association explanatory of the nature of the building and of the purposes that it is intended to subserve. I trust that they will elicit a generous response from all who have the means with which to contribute to such a laudable object. The expectation of the association is to have the building completely erected in time for the celebration of the two-hundredth anniversary of the birthday of George Washton, which is to take place in the year 1932. So if there is no objection, I should like to have the three leaflets inserted in the RECORD. One is entitled "Our Patriotic Duty"; another is entitled "The George Washington Memorial Building"; and the third is entitled "Memorandum Relating to George Washington Memorial Building."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Without objection, the articles will be inserted in the RECORD.

The articles referred to are as follows:

OUR PATRIOTIC DUTY

The chief object for which Washington fought and spoke was the development of the national spirit in his people, as is expressed in a letter to Madison, dated at Mount Vernon, November 30, 1785: "We are either a united people or we are not. If the former, let us in all matters of general concern act as a nation which has national objects to promote and a national character to support."

Washington often expressed in his messages and in letters to friends the importance of the development of science, literature, and art.

Therefore, the principal purpose of this association is to carry out the unfulfilled wish of George Washington in his last message as President to "promote an institution for the general diffusion of knowledge." Originally he left a bequest in Potomac Co. bonds to establish a national university, but after his death the company was reorganized, the value of the bonds was wiped out, and only his great wish has been left for us to carry out. After these many years we diffuse our knowledge by the means of meetings of all kinds and giving the results of our efforts to the world at large. It has therefore seemed that we can carry out Washington's wish in the broadest sense by building this memorial with a large auditorium and smaller rooms where all societies and associations from every State in the Union can meet together and from that building give the results of their efforts in every educational way. This auditorium has a seating capacity of from 7,000 to 11,000 and several smaller halls seating from 500 to 2,500 or more. There will be a pipe organ in this auditorium so endowed that the finest organists in the country can be engaged and there can be a concert every Sunday afternoon free to the populace.

The Government granted us a square of land on Seventh and B Streets for this purpose. We were deeply engaged in raising the necessary money when the late war obliged us to turn our attention to assisting our allies in the broadest sense.

We propose to give to the Army, Navy, Marines, and aviators a space 350 feet long for their memorial headquarters, consisting of a museum, library, and some archive quarters, and to endow the same, so that the committee of Army, Navy, Marines, and aviators can have full control of that portion of the building.

Space can be bought in this building for $35 a square foot. Already the National Society of Colonial Dames of America and the United States Daughters of 1812 have secured their national headquarters in the building.

We hope each State will have a room in this building for national headquarters, which will be a great educational feature of this building.

The foundations now have been finished and it remains for us to see that this work is carried on until this national useful building is finished.

So let us remember Washington's words, "Let us act as a nation which has national objects to promote and a national character to support."

The George Washington Memorial Building will be an expression of that affiliation and cooperation between all patriotic forces of our country, providing headquarters and facilities for all such activities, the only building of its kind in the world.

THE FIRST FLOOR

The main feature of the building is the large auditorium, a memorial to the signers of the Declaration of Independence, with floor area of 38,500 square feet and gallery of 10,000 square feet; stage, 3,600 square feet; seating on the floor a great audience of 6,000, in the gallery of 1,000, and on the stage 350. The acoustic properties of this hall are perfect, having been worked out by a member of the faculty of Harvard University. Behind the stage and in connection with it is a large reception room.

The auditorium will be used for all national and international conventions and inaugural balls and all other great public-welfare functions.

Grouped about the auditorium are six or seven convention halls, holding 600 to 2,500 people, and each hall has two committee or reception rooms connected with it.

THE SECOND FLOOR

A banquet hall, with serving rooms, seating 600 people, a large and small reception room, and two coat rooms. Permanent quarters for national associations and societies. A room 15 feet by 23 feet, which has in connection a small outside office 10 feet by 15 feet, may be secured in this building by payment of $35,000, and as much more space as each one may require with additional payment.

THE THIRD FLOOR

Suitable rooms can be had on the second or third floors for the thirteen original States and other States that contribute a sufficient amount toward the erection of the building; 100 rooms and students' research rooms, kitchen with full equipment connected with serving rooms on second floor.

THE FOURTH FLOOR

This floor will be left without partitions, to be divided to conform with future contingencies.

The George Washington Memorial Association will have their headquarters in this building, where all members will be welcome at all times, and one room will become a George Washington museum, for which we have already some gifts.

MEMORANDUM RELATING TO GEORGE WASHINGTON MEMORIAL BUILDING

It seems very strange that when we are planning to celebrate in 1932 the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth we do not consider the importance of finishing the George Washington Memorial Building, for which Congress has given the land for the distinct purpose of carrying out George Washington's wish as expressed in his last message to Congress, "Promote an institution for the diffusion of knowledge."

This building is a peoples' building, a place where all national and international societies can meet. All State conventions pertaining to educational matters will be welcomed. What is more fitting than to hold this 1932 celebration in this auditorium, where can be seated from seven to eleven thousand persons? Several smaller halls with a seating capacity from 500 to 2,500. A banquet hall seating 900. The people should be roused to the importance of completing this building.

Each State must have a room as an educational feature, also rooms for research work. There will also be an organ endowed so that each Sunday we may give a concert free to the populace.

NO TIME MUST BE LOST

We must begin this spring, so that it may be completed in 1932.

Let each one of us as citizens of this great country give as much as we can afford toward this great national work.

It will be one of the most important and beautiful Government buildings. When finished it will be turned over to the Government and the control and administration shall be in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. BRUCE. In conclusion I will simply add that the officers and managers of the George Washington Memorial Building are as follows:

President: Mrs. Henry F. Dimock, 1301 Sixteenth Street, Washington, D. C.

Vice Presidents: Mrs. Daniel Manning, Miss B. J. Kibbey, Mrs. Joseph B. Foraker, Mrs. Charles J. Bell, Mrs. H. R. Mallory, Mrs. E. H. Harriman.

Treasurer: Mrs. Frank Northrop.

Trustees: Mrs. C. S. Hamlin, Mrs. P. N. Moore, Mrs. J. Mayhew Wainwright.

Advisory council: Hon. Elihu Root, Hon. J. B. Payne, Hon. William H. Taft, Dr. C. W. Dabney, Dr. William H. Welch, Dr. Thomas E. Green, Prof. H. F. Osborn, Mr. Charles J. Bell.

JUDICIAL SALARIES (S. DOC. NO. 81)

Mr. OVERMAN presented the report of the special committee on salaries of Federal judges submitted to the meeting of the American Bar Association at Buffalo, N. Y., August 30-31, 1927, which was ordered to be printed as a Senate document.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, on March 27 the House of Representatives passed House bill 6844, and it was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. There was a star print of the same bill on March 28; and according to that bill, being the same number, H. R. 6844, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A bill of the same character—in fact, exactly the same wording—was introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee held a hearing upon the Senate bill and the House bill, and ordered the bill reported out favorably, substituting the House bill for the Senate bill. The subject involved is one relating to banking in the District of Columbia.

I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 6844, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, just a word in regard to the public-buildings program.

As I understand, we have not yet agreed to construct a Supreme Court Building where the Supreme Court will sit to try cases. I for one am opposed to moving the Supreme Court out of the Capitol. I think we ought to keep it right where it is; I am willing to have a building constructed for the justices to occupy and have their libraries and their working rooms there; but I for one should hate to see the Supreme Court moved out of the Capitol. As I say, I think it ought to remain where it is.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL SUNDAY

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn until Sunday next at 3 o'clock p. m., the hour fixed for memorial addresses on the late Senator JONES of New Mexico.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Sunday, April 8, 1928, at 3 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, April 6, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, hear our prayer. He was wounded for our transgressions; He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed. As we stand in hushed silence before His cross we feel the nightly stillness of the world's winter; we turn pale with the sense of something fearful. Like a fountain of fire, cruelty has broken loose and every word burns with hate. Thou God, have mercy, for the earth is cursed by the hopes it has wasted and by the truth it has outraged. Hearken unto the voice of our cry and consider our meditation, for great is our fall, demoralized is our condition, and without Thee our thralldom is complete. Our souls wait in the solemnity of these moments. O hear us; whatever this life may bring us, may it never take from us the full faith that Thou art our Saviour. On Calvary's cross is the expression of our utmost need and our utmost hope. Set it up in all our breasts and reign there in the fullness of Thy grace; then life and the long forever shall be our inheritance. Thou Christ! Mary's holy child! from beyond the limits of the worlds Thou shalt come again on eternity's high day, clothed with infinite glory. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 2301. An act to create a commission to be known as the commission for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds, and for other purposes;

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill (H. R. 11579) entitled "An act relating to investigation of new uses of cotton."

The message further announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11133) entitled "An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. JONES, and Mr. GLASS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXPORT TRADE

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8927) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8927, with Mr. LUCE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Texas has no one who wishes to go on, I suggest that we proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas has used more time than the gentleman from Missouri. Under ordinary procedure I assume that unless the gentleman from Missouri has concluded debate in support of the bill, he ought now to yield some time to people on his side.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HICKEY].

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, in considering this bill I think it is well to take into account what changes it makes in present law. The present law was passed on April 10, 1918, and is what is known as the Webb-Pomerene Act. The purpose of that law was to promote the organization of associations in this country for the purpose of export trade. The proposed legislation makes certain changes in the present law. The identical language of that law is carried in this bill, on the first page of the bill and down to line 7 on the second page of the bill. The new language on that page, extending to line 3 on page 2, is with respect to authorizing the organization of associations for the purpose of import trade, where the imports are controlled by foreign governmental combinations or foreign monopolies.

This section which is in italic, on page 2 of the bill, relates to commerce in crude rubber, potash, sisal, and other raw materials. In order to make the provisions of this section operative, the Secretary of Commerce must certify, first, that such material is not available in sufficient quantities in the United States, and that, second, such material or such products are controlled by a foreign governmental combination or monopoly.

Under the provisions of the Webb-Pomerene Act, which was passed solely, in my opinion, for the purpose of aiding the producers and exporters of this country in placing their goods upon foreign markets, substantial benefit has come to the American people.

I wish at this point to submit to the committee some figures on this question which are particularly illuminating. But before doing so I invite attention to the fact that that bill was passed during the war period. It is therefore clear that the purpose of the legislation was not to stimulate our foreign trade, because at that time the great industries of the belligerent nations were in a state of exhaustion or rapidly approaching such a state, and the allied countries with which we were associated in the war were calling upon us for all of our surplus products from factory, mill, and farm. I have therefore chosen years sufficiently remote from the war period to be regarded as normal years, and I quote figures covering those years showing our exports, imports, and the excess of exports over imports, and the total:

United States foreign trade

EXPORT AND IMPORT TOTALS

	Exports	Imports	Total	Excess of exports
1922	$3,831,777,000	$3,112,747,000	$6,944,524,000	$719,030,000
1923	4,167,493,000	3,792,066,000	7,959,559,000	375,427,000
1924	4,590,984,000	3,609,963,000	8,200,947,000	981,021,000
1925	4,909,848,000	4,226,589,000	9,136,437,000	683,258,000
1926	4,808,660,000	4,430,888,000	9,239,548,000	377,772,000
1927	4,865,508,000

A commerce such as this helps every home in the land. Think of the amount of capital and the amount of labor necessary for such a foreign trade.

These figures are convincing proof that the provisions of the Webb-Pomerene Act which enables the mass selling of our goods abroad has been of inestimable value to American producers and American consumers as well.

The three commodities that are provided for in this bill are commodities that are produced in foreign countries, and we are dependent to a very large extent upon foreign countries for them. Rubber is one of the products included in this bill. We consume 70 per cent of the world's production of rubber. So, should this legislation become law, it will enable the consumers of rubber in this country to go into the world market and buy in large quantities. Under present-day conditions we all know that mass production and mass distribution are two of the important elements that enter into the cost of every commodity that goes into consumption in this or any other country.

To give you something on where these commodities are produced, the quantities, and the amounts consumed in this country, I invite your attention to the subject of crude rubber. The following is self-explanatory:

The Dutch and the English Governments for some years have controlled the prices of rubber. This price mounted recently under such control to $1.20 per pound. This price was reflected in the cost of tires to every American consumer, and in the cost of every rubber product used by the American people. In order to combat these foreign governmental monopolies, a purchasing organization was established in the United States which enables those connected with it to go into the world market and buy rubber in mass quantities. This in itself, coupled with the prospect of this remedial legislation, has influenced the market to such an extent that at this time the price of rubber has been reduced to something like normal. As a consequence, every rubber user in the United States has been benefited.

Sisal is another commodity that is a farm necessity. It is used in the manufacture of binder twine and rope. This commodity is used more largely by farmers than any other class of people, although, of course, it is consumed in considerable quantities in the manufacture of rope and related commodities. Sisal is produced very largely in Mexico and the Dutch East Indies. Certain other countries produce sisal in minor quantities. For the information of the committee I submit the following data:

World production of sisal

	Long tons
1925	185,900
1926	188,300
1927	118,829

The total imports for 1926 were 125,619 tons, valued at $21,800,000, and the total imports for 1927 were 118,829 tons, valued at $18,200,000. It will be seen from these figures that most of the world's production is consumed in the United States, and, as I have heretofore stated, consumed by the farmers. I also wish to state that we are entirely dependent upon foreign countries for this commodity. How anyone interested in the farmer can oppose this proposed legislation is difficult to understand.

Much has been said in the debate on the question of potash, and some of those who are opposing the bill have suggested that potash and sisal were included in the bill in order to win the farmers' support and that the American Farm Bureau Federation and the National Grange were led astray in this regard. The facts dispute this contention.

On the question of potash I wish to invite your attention to the fact that there was imported into the United States, in 1924, 200,365 short tons, valued at $13,368,127; in 1925, 238,703 short tons, valued at $12,730,019; in 1926, 245,231 short tons, valued at $13,635,154. I do not have the figures for the year 1927, but it must be patent to all that the demand for this product and sisal, both so essential to successful agriculture, must have been a controlling factor with the representatives of the great farm organizations in reaching the conclusion that they should support this legislation.

I now wish to invite your attention to those who appeared in support of this proposed legislation: National Grange, Department of Commerce, National Automobile Association, American Farm Bureau Federation, National Fertilizer Association, Manufacturing Chemists' Association of the United States, General Motors Corporation, United States Rubber Co., and the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., and others.

Again, I repeat that the sole purpose of this bill is to aid the people of this country in buying those commodities that are produced almost entirely in foreign countries and under monopolies controlled and protected by their respective governments.

I feel convinced, after a careful study of the legislation, that it is not in conflict with the Sherman antitrust law. Indeed, the provisions of the bill make this clear.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. In the statement of Mr. John J. Raskob before the committee, he says that the United States uses 70 per cent of the rubber raised in the world, and the gentleman from Indiana said 90 per cent. Could the gentleman harmonize those figures for the benefit of the committee?

Mr. HICKEY. Seventy per cent of the world's production. I think those figures are correct.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the title of this bill is "A bill to amend the act entitled 'An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes.'" I can conceive of no more misleading title for a piece of legislation that proposes to do what this does. The very purpose and intent of this monopoly that is to be created under the terms of this bill is to limit foreign trade and to limit and control prices at which the necessary product is to be sold.

If you will read these hearings you will be still further astonished at the title, unless you come to the field of operation of that phrase, "for other purposes." You would think this is a farm relief bill from the way Mr. Tabor talked about it before the Committee on the Judiciary. He held that this legislation is something for the benefit of the farmers and that it was going to give them a cheap price for those commodities they consumed of which rubber is a constituent.

I would suggest to the farm bloc that they look into this matter and see if under all the circumstances it would be wise for them, after striking out the enacting clause, to offer the McNary-Haugen bill as a substitute. The real title that this bill ought to have is this: "A bill to legitimatize something that is now illegitimate; to give it a respectable name; and to make it capable of inheritance."

It is admitted on every side that this bill proposes to legalize something that is now illegal. It has also been suggested in the hearings that action has been taken by buyers of rubber in contravention of the law as it now stands, and therefore, finding themselves in a condition where they feel that they must be indorsed in what they have done and must be given solid ground for the future in what they propose to do, for that purpose they come to Congress with this bill and hold it up before you gentlemen with the statement that a great emergency exists—a great emergency, a very much overworked word—that we are confronted with an emergency which demands immediate legislation and nothing else will do but that you must allow this gigantic monopoly to enter the field of purchase.

Mr. Hoover was before our committee. He made a very interesting statement which attracted the attention of all who heard him. He said—and I am not attempting to quote his exact words—that an emergency existed; that this legislation was necessary, because the consuming public of America is at the mercy of those who had combined in foreign countries to elevate the price of rubber unconscionably; and that being true, we must meet force with force; and that we are justified in setting up a monopoly on this side of the ocean to fight a monopoly on the other side of the ocean.

We might possibly, as a matter of right, be justified in doing it, but we ought not to pass legislation here to-day in this slipshod fashion, with this scant measure of attention that has been given to it; legislation that is striking at the very vitals of a long series of laws enacted by the Congress, dating back for many, many years.

Whatever else John Sherman was, he had great claims to be known as a statesman. He foresaw the troubles growing out of the growth of trusts, and he wrote on the statute books what is known as the Sherman antitrust law, which was proposed to curb monopoly; and he said, more than three decades ago, that the people of this country had the choice of two things: One to control these monopolies, or else to sit still and let them control us; that it was a question then—and it is more a question now—which is the greater effective power, the Government that creates or this combination of capital that springs up under the wings of the Government?

So, gentlemen, when you enact this legislation you are repealing the principle upon which the Sherman antitrust law was founded. You are repealing the principle of the Clayton Antitrust Act, and you are directly and by words repealing a substantial part of the Webb-Pomerene Act.

If you think that the emergency is such as to demand so drastic and far-reaching a piece of legislation as that, what are you doing here? First, you are creating a monopoly with capital unlimited. Second, you are creating a monopoly the time in which it may operate is unlimited. Third, you are creating a monopoly the place in which it may operate is unlimited. Its field is the world. Its period of existence is eternity, so far as this bill is concerned; and the capital that it may employ, either at home or abroad, is not even mentioned by way of limitation in any part of this bill.

Why, even Mr. Hoover himself suggested what he considered should be a thing necessary to be included in this bill, and that is that it is an emergency which would justify the enactment of the bill, and when that emergency is passed the monopoly should be terminated. Is that in the bill? Not at all. These brethren who are so interested in the farmer overlooked that, and decided to give free course to this monopoly, which they say is the only means by which they can fight the foreign monopoly.

Another thing which has already been pointed out to this Congress, and which I desire to repeat for a moment and to emphasize, is the fact that we are by this legislation inviting trade war by way of retaliation from foreign countries. Yet they say this is a bill designed in the interest of our export trade. If we set the example in America of creating a gigantic monopoly to control the price of things that are produced outside of the United States, to reduce their price in the interest of our consumers, and in defiance of the law of supply and demand, that is nothing more nor less than an invitation to the nations of Europe to combine and reduce the price of things we export.

Where will you cotton farmers, you wheat farmers, and you meat producers be if you have to meet a monopoly of that kind across the water? Is it not just as fair for them to say we are getting too much for these things that we are producing in America? I will not dwell on that longer. You are men of experience and can see that without any further suggestion.

But, gentlemen, here is the situation with which we are confronted: If there has ever existed a reason for this legislation it has passed. That is conceded on all sides. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] yesterday afternoon illustrated that very aptly in his amusing anecdote about his colored friend down in Texas and the breaking bank. The thing has "busted in the face" of the proponents of this bill. That is all. You are out on a limb that is being sawed off between you and the tree; you are hanging on and trying to save your faces because you have gotten in and can not see any elegant way to get out.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BOWLING. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The leading editorial of the Washington Post this morning admits that the rubber monopoly has broken down and that was asserted as the primary cause for this bill.

Mr. BOWLING. I thank you very much, Governor. I have that editorial before me and I had in mind calling attention to it just a little bit later.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLING. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Does the gentleman from Alabama happen to have before him the decline of rubber since Mr. Hoover testified before the committee?

Mr. BOWLING. I do not have it before me, but I have a recollection as to what the figures are, as stated here in debate yesterday. The day that Mr. Hoover was before the committee and pointed out what he considered to be an emergency situation, rubber was 42 cents a pound.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. BOWLING. At this time it is 21 or 22 cents a pound. So, gentlemen, if there ever was an emergency it has passed.

Why do you want this uncertain piece of legislation, the boundless possibilities of which for evil can not now even be measured, and especially when the necessity you have pointed out no longer exists? I can not conceive of any reason why we should pass this legislation at the present time.

One more thing of the number of things. Our good friend Representative MOORE of Virginia called my attention to this. There is nothing in this bill which will effectively prevent the combination of this monopoly with foreign monopolies if they desire to fix, or, as they say, to stabilize the price of rubber at a high level. There is, perhaps, one word in section 2 of this bill which says that they must not do that. Over toward the latter part of the bill it is provided that if the Federal Trade Commission were to come to the conclusion that the pool had done something in violation of the law they will look into it, and there is your remedy. There is no penalty provided for a violation of this. There is no fixed punishment if the provisions of the bill are violated. It is merely provided that the Federal Trade Commission may look into the matter and to give what they consider to be good advice; if the good advice is not taken then they are to write a friendly note to the Attorney General and tell him about it. That is the sole "penalty" provided in this bill. With the slow-moving processes of the law of the land any injury that might be effected would long since have been effected before the processes of the law could reach this monopoly acting in violation of the law. So as I see it, gentlemen, with the emergency, if it ever existed, admittedly gone, that called this bill into existence, with the dangers with which it is necessarily fraught and confronting every reasonable man, with the smoke screen of farm relief and your prattle about sisal and potash, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] referring to them yesterday as just merely excess baggage and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] referring to them as merely the traveling companions of the rubber monopoly that is to be created to help rubber over the rough places, it is after all merely a sop to the farmers and the farm bloc in the House of Representatives, and with all these facts laid before you are you going to go to sleep like Mr. Taber did when he appeared before the Judiciary Committee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS].

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama who has just preceded me made the statement that this legislation is being considered in a very slipshod fashion. I simply want to say in passing that this legislation, which has been favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee, has received the commendation and the support of the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Agriculture, and has also been publicly indorsed by Colonel Donovan, the Assistant to the Attorney General, who has charge of the prosecutions for the violation of the antitrust law. The gentleman who just preceded me also made the remark that this legislation constituted a repeal of the sacred principles of the Sherman antitrust law. Of course, it is an amendment of the Sherman antitrust law, but there is nothing about the Sherman antitrust law which makes it inviolate and prohibits any amendment. When the Sherman antitrust law was enacted no one for a moment thought that it meant to prevent combinations in restraint of all trade; no one thought for one minute that it meant to prevent combinations which were not unreasonable in the restraint of trade. Senator Hoar, from my own State, who was one of the conferees from the Senate at the time this Sherman antitrust law was enacted, distinctly said at the time that this Sherman antitrust law did nothing more or less than engraft upon our Federal statute books the principle of the common law, which is that combinations are lawful in so far as they are not unreasonable in the restraint of trade, and it was only the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Trans-Missouri case in 1897 that laid down the drastic rule that under the Sherman antitrust law all combinations were in restraint of trade. It took 14 years before the United States Supreme Court, through Chief Justice White, could put into effect the rule of reason.

I maintain that the real purpose and intent of the Sherman antitrust law is to prevent combinations in unreasonable restraint of trade and not to prevent all combinations. This is borne out by the fact that so far as there being anything sacred about the Sherman antitrust law is concerned, right here in 1913 in this House legislation was passed saying you should not prosecute combinations to raise the price of wages or to better labor conditions, and that you should not prosecute combinations to increase the price of agricultural products. If this is perfectly right and true for labor organizations, if it is perfectly right and true for farming organizations, it is just as true and proper for us to come in here and ask you to put through legislation which simply means the protection of the consumer in his use of goods which are an absolute necessity, and rubber, sisal, and potash come within that classification.

And the stipulation with respect to all this legislation is that it must apply, and the legislation can only apply, where it concerns a commodity which can not be produced in this country and which is in the control of a foreign monopoly. The minute you do not have both of these factors in existence, this law can not take effect. So bear in mind that this legislation is simply to take care of a situation where these two factors are present—a product or raw material which can not be produced in this country and which is in the control of a foreign monopoly.

Now, my friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING] has stated that there is no need of this legislation at the present time; that the market has broken down and the price has come down to something like twenty-odd cents a pound and, therefore, we do not need it. Well, when did this price break? It only broke within a few days. The simple pronouncement of the English Premier has not absolutely bound England to do away with this monopoly, and it was only while we were considering this bill in our committee something like three or four weeks ago that the price was 40 cents a pound, and all through last year it was 40 cents a pound, and in 1925 it was $1.21 a pound, and it is perfectly true, as the gentleman has said, we are legalizing an association which was put into existence to stabilize the price of these products that are in the control of a monopoly.

If we did not legalize this association, what would happen or what would have happened? In 1925 when there was no association providing for a consolidation of purchasing power, the price of raw material varied 85 cents a pound during the year, and this meant a loss of several hundred millions of dollars to the people of this country, and in 1926——

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. I am sorry I can not yield, as my time is short.

And in 1926 the price varied 55 cents a pound, which meant hundreds of millions of dollars to the people of this country, and it was only when this association, which my friend says does not have any legal existence, was put into effect in 1927 that the price was stabilized, with a result of a variation in price of only 9 cents a pound throughout the year, saving to the people of this country several hundreds of millions of dollars.

It was urged on the floor here yesterday, Why put this legislation through, inasmuch as the planters of the Dutch East Indies are in competition with England? How are we to know what is going on or what will happen in the future? In fact, it is perfectly obvious at the present time, and it is so reported, that the English Government or the English planters are in combination with the Dutch planters even now to control this raw material and we are absolutely helpless. We have got to have our rubber, we have got to have our sisal, and yet these are raw materials which are produced outside of this country, and we are absolutely helpless.

If the Dutch Indies planters and the English planters get together, either under the Stevenson plan or any other plan to control the price, this legislation is the only safeguard and protection which would enable us to meet such a situation if it arose.

There was one more thought presented by my friend from Alabama, who stated that the trouble with this legislation is there are no teeth in it; there is nothing here to safeguard the interests of the people. I am afraid his study of the bill has not produced the same result that mine has. If you will read this bill carefully, you will find it says that this combination is only taken out of the operation of the Sherman antitrust law provided it conforms to certain conditions, and the minute it fails to conform to those conditions it ceases to have the protection of this act and is liable to all the prosecutions provided under the Sherman antitrust law. To be sure, it turns over to the Federal Trade Commission the investigation of these acts, but when it comes to the question of prosecutions, every single violation which can be prosecuted and punished to-day under the Sherman antitrust law is just as applicable under this law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. I have only two or three minutes more, and I want to make this perfectly clear.

This act says that the investigation shall be made on the part of the Federal Trade Commission, and it also goes on to say that the Federal Trade Commission shall have all the powers that they have under the 1914 act creating it, and it also provides in section 2—and I call the attention of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Alabama specifically to this—that nothing contained in the act shall be construed as declaring this association to be illegal provided it lives up to the obligations and the provisions of this act, and the minute it ceases to live up to the provisions and the obligations of this act all the protection of the act is taken away.

My friend from Alabama says there is nothing in this act to prevent the control of the price that the people who go into this association may charge. I want to say to you that there is nothing in this proposed law which makes it compulsory for anybody to go into this combination, and I do not suppose for one minute that one-half of the rubber dealers in this country will go into this combination, because they will not want to invest the money and take the chance and the gamble of going into it, but whatever proportion of them do go in and thereby stabilize the price, there is nothing to prevent every other rubber dealer in this country going into the market and taking advantage of this stabilization of price and buying freely on the market. In other words, all this bill does is to provide that it is possible for such an association to be formed.

There is nothing in the bill that makes it compulsory, and only those people who want to go in have to go in, and the people who do not go in—remember this—the people who do not go in have the privilege of buying at the same price that the people who do go in, and the people who do not go in, under the provisions of this bill, can not be discriminated against, but can buy at the same price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. STOBBS. And last, and most important of all, the world market, whether it is rubber, sisal, or anything else, is open to them all. After the price has been stabilized there is nothing to prevent any one of these men going into the market and buying the raw material, rubber, sisal, or anything else, on the market at the same price at which it has been stabilized by the association; and I say to you gentlemen that this legislation is in the interest of the people, the consumers of these raw products in this country, and it has received the approval of the authorities of our Government after careful study and consideration.

We are not here asking you to put through any legislation that is going to create a monopoly in the interest of any favored few but legislation which is going to inure to the benefit of the common people of this country, and you and I and all of us will have the benefit of the reduced prices we are going to have to pay for our raw materials and our products. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KURTZ].

Mr. KURTZ. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, "It is necessary to fight the devil with fire." This is an old adage that is born of the experience of mankind throughout the ages and is but another way of expressing the doctrine of self-defense as enunciated by the common law of England. Under that law a man who is assailed has the privilege of giving his assailant blow for blow. If he has his back to the wall or is assaulted by one with a deadly weapon or his life is in imminent danger, he can use a deadly weapon in defending himself, even unto death. It seems to me this principle is the one that actuates those who believe in the passage of this bill.

I am not so much afraid of a combination to-day as I was years ago. The United States Government is not so fearful of monopolies as it was years ago. I remember many years ago when the Standard Oil Co. was divided by our Government into its different parts, and each part is now greater than the original. The original was feared, but the divided parts, although tremendous in size, are no longer feared by our Government.

Combinations are largely the product of modern civilization, and when benevolent and under the regulation of the Government may be instruments of great good. A. T. Stewart realized the power of combination when he founded his great department store in New York in the last century. Marshal Field realized it when he established his great department store that still bears his name in Chicago. John Wanamaker, the merchant prince of Philadelphia and New York, realized it when he laid the foundation for his great mercantile emporiums. Since then the great chain stores have sprung up all over the land and are powerful and able to do business profitably largely because of perfect combination. The allied governments realized it during the Great War. For months the armies of the Central Powers, under absolute unity of control, were able to more than hold their own against superior numbers under divided control, and it was only after the allied armies were placed under Marshal Foch, with a monopoly of direction vested in him, that victory was attained.

Since that time the United States has invited the railroads to combine for the sake of efficiency. The Government no longer fears a combination. It no longer fears a benevolent monopoly. The word "monopoly" is not nearly so dangerous now as it was in the past. But always this monopoly must be under the absolute regulation of the Federal authorities.

When I see a monopoly in Great Britain to-day that has absolute control of the rubber industry; when I see a monopoly in France and Germany to-day that has absolute control of potash; when I see a monopoly in Mexico to-day that has absolute control of the sisal industry, I believe in giving the men of America engaged in mercantile pursuits the same weapons as the nations across the water and Mexico to the south of us have. You can not expect anyone to fight a winning battle without having the same weapons, or weapons as good, as those of his adversary. You can not expect a man to engage in a victorious business battle without the same weapons as those in the hands of the other party. When you have monopoly across the water and 50 men buying rubber in America, you have high prices. One seller and two buyers make high prices. Two sellers and one buyer make low prices.

In other words, you will find that the price of a commodity depends very largely on the number of purchasers. If you limit the purchasers to one individual, which in this case would possibly be a monopoly, although it might not rise to the dignity of a monopoly but only to that of a combination—when you do this, there will be but one purchaser, and when there is only one purchaser there is little likelihood of exorbitant prices.

I am for this bill because I have farmers in my district and they need its enactment. I have examined the bill, and I have listened to what Mr. Taber, the head of the grange, has said, and I would rather take the testimony of Mr. Taber, who is interested in farming and the farmer, who knows all about agriculture, than to take the testimony of a man who does not know anything about farming whatsoever. I, for one, am willing to take the opinion of one who knows rather than the opinion of one who only pretends to know. We have his testimony that the farmer uses more rubber than any other particular class, more sisal than any other particular class, and more potash than any other particular class in America. I stand for the farmer to-day, and with Mr. Taber.

No nation has ever destroyed its agriculture and lived, and no nation ever will. Within the confines of one small township in Pennsylvania there are at this hour 32 farms not only vacant but absolutely abandoned, and the doors of the houses and the barns swing creaking in the wind. This bill, in my opinion, will give the farmer cheaper rubber for his automobiles, cheaper potash for his fertilizer, and cheaper sisal for his binder twine and other like needs.

It is urged by the opposition that this bill might produce a monopoly. If a monopoly, it would be a benevolent one under the supervision of the Government. The Government gives it life, the Government controls it after it has come into being, and the Government takes its life for doing what it should not do. No harm can come of it if it be not needed in the future. If needed, however, it is here for use like a weapon of warfare, to be used when required and laid aside when not needed. Let us be prepared for all emergencies. Let us pass the bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS] made quite a fervent appeal on behalf of the common people and justified his support of this bill because of the benefits that the common people will derive from this legislation.

The gentleman who just preceded me, my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KURTZ], justifies his support of the bill on the ground that it is going to be of great benefit to the farmer.

Now I will tell one. [Laughter.] I am opposed to the bill because it is vicious from the first line after the enacting clause down to the very last word of the last sentence of the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts, my colleague on the committee, pointed out that our committee had given this matter profound study, deliberate thought, that we held extensive hearings, and that we have studied the problem deeply.

Now, gentlemen, I will say that at one time the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of this House did give this matter a great deal of study.

They did hold extensive hearings, but they did not come out with a report to the House recommending any such bill as would create a monopoly and put five rubber companies and three or four automobile companies in the absolute control of the entire supply of raw rubber.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. WELLER. I yielded to the gentleman yesterday.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall yield later on. I show you the hearings of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. They consist of over 400 pages, and that committee came out with a constructive report that really did a lot of good. On the other hand I show you our hearings, a very slim pamphlet, indeed. Just a few pages. Overawed by four or five men representing General Motors and two tire companies who came in, after this meager hearing, the great Judiciary Committee came out with this bill that changes the established policy of our Government in the supervision and control of trade and prohibiting combinations in restraint of trade.

The antitrust law is still on our statute books. Recently we have not heard much about it. The fact remains nevertheless that combinations, pools, and agreements in restraint of trade are unlawful. While at the present time it may be the policy of the administration to be lenient or even to look with a broader viewpoint to combinations and perhaps establish a broader degree of restraint before moving on offending parties, I tell you gentlemen that the law is most useful. It can be invoked, and I predict that before very long there will be the necessity of invoking it against combinations and agreements that are now perhaps going along reasonably but will soon become so powerful and greedy that their interpretation of reasonable restraint will bring them in conflict with the provisions of the existing law. But if the antitrust laws are to be repealed, let those favoring repeal assume the responsibility and bring in such a bill. The issue will then be squarely raised. We can meet it when it comes, but I do object to seeking to break down the antitrust laws and their enforcement by piecemeal legislation.

This is a bill to amend the provisions of the Webb-Pomerene Act, and would make lawful combinations, pools, and associations for the purpose of buying certain commodities in foreign countries. It would give the same rights and powers to importing concerns as are now given to combinations engaged in the export trade. The reasons and necessities urged in support of the amendment of the antitrust laws to the extent of making an exception to export trade can not be considered in justifying the bill under consideration. It serves, however, as a typical example that once exceptions to a general statute are made a persistent demand for more exceptions follow until the entire purposes of the original law is broken down.

The real purpose of the bill is to permit the creation of pools and combinations for the purchase of raw rubber. In order to make the bill more attractive legislatively and otherwise the overworked farmer was brought in by adding potash and sisal to the provisions of the bill. Later, in order to give it the color of constitutionality and to take it from the category of class legislation, it was extended to include any "other raw materials or products of nature in a crude or unfinished state which are certified by the Secretary of Commerce to be of a character not made, produced, or grown in substantial quantities within the United States, and to be controlled by any foreign government, combination, or monopoly." The bill as it is now before the House throws the doors wide open, and a trust may be formed for the purchase abroad and the importation into the United States of any raw material that may be certified by the Secretary of Commerce.

While it is conceded that the reduction of the number of buyers for a given commodity in a foreign market might tend to reduce prices, nothing, notwithstanding specific saving clauses in the bill, can guarantee to the consumers of this country the benefit of reduced prices. The history of monopolies in this country is to the contrary from the time when the trusts were in their glory through the trust-busting period and as late as the laissez faire attitude of the present day. The American people have paid an enhanced price whenever a commodity was controlled by a trust or monopoly. The bill for that reason is fraught with many dangers and evils.

Most of the sponsors of the bill save themselves by recommending the passage of the bill with the reservation that Congress will protect the consumers and prevent the monopoly of supply or enhanced prices.

Even the author of the bill suggests that the bill ought to be plain in providing against monopolistic control of the sale of the raw material once it has been imported by any of these legalized combinations. If the Members will turn to page 11 of the hearings they will find the statement.

The letter from the Secretary of Agriculture makes it plain that the legislation should prevent any association from entering into any agreement, understanding, or conspiracy to do any act which would artificially or intentionally enhance prices. The letter is on pages 14 and 15 of the hearings. Yet the mere fact that the bill contains a proviso to that effect is, as a practical matter, indeed far from guaranteeing such results.

The national master of the National Grange appeared before the committee, approved of the bill, but expressed three fears which he now claims have been overcome, to wit: (1) The ultimate consumer might be penalized by this enlarged purchasing power resulting in the combination which would raise the price instead of benefiting the consumer; (2) that the combination would provide the raw material to such firms and concerns in the combination and could easily discriminate against others and especially new enterprises; (3) the danger of discrimination against cooperative groups of agriculture. The witness then states that the language contained in the bill which prohibits the enhancing of prices and the discrimination in the sale of or refusal to sell such commodities is sufficient to allay his fear and that the farmer would be protected in every way. It is safe to say that exactly the same provision is contained in existing laws to-day, and yet the farmer is paying enhanced prices for many articles produced under monopolistic conditions required in his daily life.

Two letters are inserted in the record from two prominent law firms of New York City. They are identical. While they may be of value as to the constitutionality of the bill as drawn putting all raw materials on an equal basis, these letters throw no light on the practical or economic effect and results of the bill should it be enacted into law.

The representative of the General Motors Corporation made a strong argument for his side of the case. The purchasers of large quantities of raw rubber have, as a matter of fact, heretofore pooled for the purchase of their supply. This witness stated that "we evolved a plan that resulted in the formation of a $50,000,000 buying pool, which dealt in rubber throughout the whole year 1927, and all connected with that effort, including Mr. Secretary Hoover, who has just addressed you, have advised me that they believe that that pool was instrumental in driving the rubber speculator out of the market, with the result that the fluctuation in the price of rubber during that year was reduced to 9 cents, which is the greatest degree of stability in rubber in the last 20 years." This testimony may be found on page 23 of the hearing.

The witness did not state just how the savings resulting to the purchasing pool was reflected during the corresponding period in the retail prices of tires or automobiles.

Most of the hearings were devoted to the rubber industry. Letters and statements were filed pertaining to sisal and potash. Referring to sisal, the letter from the Secretary of Agriculture reveals this startling condition, on pages 14 to 16 of the hearings:

> In the case of sisal, for instance, it is estimated that at no time during the period of exorbitantly high war prices did the actual producer receive more than 7 cents a pound even when the control agency was getting nearly three times that amount. Much of the profits was taken by the Government in various forms of taxes. The same situation holds true in the case of other commodities.

That being so, the legalizing of a purchasing monopoly for this commodity can bring no relief to the farmers.

As a matter of fact several of the State governments are now purchasing sisal for their own farmers. A committee composed of representatives of the various States now purchasing sisal solely for the benefit of farmers and without profit could easily be formed to constitute one purchasing agency and could in no way be construed as violating existing antitrust laws.

While a great deal may properly be said of the desire of obtaining potash at the lowest possible figure, yet the ultimate cost of fertilizers does not depend upon the passage of this bill. The utilization of the natural water power throughout this country operated for the benefit of the consumers instead of being handed to power monopolies is the ultimate solution of the problem of cheap fertilizer for the farmers of the United States.

Besides rubber, sisal, and potash specifically mentioned in the bill among other raw material which could without any question be immediately certified by the Secretary of Commerce as coming within the definition of the bill are coffee, tea, mercury, camphor, and iodine which by no means "exhaust the list of controlled products."

That being so it can readily be seen that before long all of these commodities will be monopolized by purchasing pools or combines. Why the Secretary of Commerce himself now admits that nine or more different raw materials would come within the definition of the bill, and adds that the articles named by him by no means exhaust the list of controlled products. That being so the same Secretary could on the very day that this bill became a law certify to that effect and each of these important products would be controlled by a purchasing pool.

I shall make my argument assuming that no statement had been made in London yesterday or the day before respecting the abandonment of the Stevenson plan. I am willing to assume with you for the purpose of debate on this bill that the Stevenson plan will remain in existence, because the Stevenson plan was in existence at the time that I submitted the minority report, and I can justify my opposition to the bill regardless of what happens to the Stevenson plan. In the first place, the impression has been created by the sponsors of this bill that the so-called Stevenson plan creates an absolute monopoly, and that there is but one source of supply of English raw rubber. That is not the fact. All that the Stevenson plan does—and by the way it seems to be rather sound and effective for the protection of producers and I suggest a very careful study of the Stevenson plan to my farmer friends—is to maintain the price of raw rubber in the neighborhood of 36 cents a pound. It does not want rubber to jump above that, because when the rubber jumps above 36 cents, when it skyrockets up to high prices, it is not the rubber producer who gets the prices any more than it is the wheat farmer who gets the prices when wheat suddenly goes up. It is the speculator, it is the stock-ticker man, who derives the profit from unreasonably high prices. The rubber producer like the wheat farmer in such instances is left holding the bag. The Stevenson plan seeks to keep the price of rubber at 36 cents, and when it drops below 36 cents it automatically puts an export tax on rubber in order to prevent the supply from flooding the market. That is all it does. When it goes back to 36 cents, off comes the excess export tax. If it were true that this was an absolute monopoly, then the American buyers could go to but one source to buy their raw rubber. As a matter of fact there are several sources of sale and there is no monopoly of sale or of supply as a monopoly is generally understood.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In just a moment. When the price is pyramided up to $1.20, the gentleman from Minnesota in his usual frankness, in his typical manner of making an honest statement to the House, admitted that the Stevenson plan was not the only factor that created those enormously high prices. I will tell you what happened. The American buyers went out after the Stevenson plan, American speculators, seeking to get an advantage over one another, and they boosted these prices in speculative buying, bidding one against the other; but no portion of the proceeds of those high prices ever went into the pockets of the British rubber producers.

It is well worth while to give a little time to consideration of this Stevenson plan. I will read from a memorandum submitted by the Rubber Association of America which was submitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House. It is dated July 16, 1925, and will be found on page 60 of the hearings of that committee on House Resolution 59, first session, sixty-ninth Congress:

The supposed object of the Stevenson scheme was to stabilize the price of crude rubber at 1s. 6d. per pound, or roughly about 36 cents. This was fixed as a price which would not only give a satisfactory profit to the producer, but would be sufficient to stimulate the investment of new capital in the planting of additional acreage. The method provided by the scheme for accomplishing this object is as follows: The actual output of each producer for the year beginning November 1, 1919, was taken as his "standard production." During the first quarter of the operation of the scheme each producer was permitted to export at the low, minimum rate of export duty, only 60 per cent of his "standard production." If he exceeded that percentage, he would have to pay what, up to the present, has proved to be a prohibitive export duty on the entire amount exported. The more the amount exported exceeds the prescribed percentage the higher the export duty.

The prescribed percentage is subject to change each quarter, depending upon the average price for the preceding quarter. That is, if the average price for a certain quarter is between 1s. 3d. and 1s. 6d., the prescribed percentage exportable during the following quarter at the minimum rate of duty is increased 5 per cent for the next quarter, and if the price is 1s. 6d. or over for a given quarter, the prescribed percentage is increased 10 per cent. So also, if the average price falls below 1s., the percentage is decreased to 55 per cent, and if that reduction does not raise the average price to 1s. 3d. in the next quarter a further reduction in the prescribed percentage to 50 per cent becomes effective, and so on.

As is apparent from this brief résumé of the scheme, it was an attempt artificially to maintain the price of rubber at 1s. 6d. by altering the amount of rubber exported or "released" each quarter.

The Stevenson scheme went into operation on November 1, 1922. At that time the world stock of crude rubber was large and it took some time before the effect of the restriction scheme was felt to any great extent. But upon the depletion of the accumulated stock (accompanied by a rapidly increasing rate of rubber consumption) the situation immediately took on a serious aspect, and now, as a result of the operation of the scheme, the price of rubber has been forced up to about three times the normal price of 36 cents, and there is threatened an actual shortage in the amount of rubber and need to meet the requirements of the consuming public.

Now, as a matter of fact 36 cents a pound is not an unreasonable price. Every witness before the committee admitted that 36 cents is a fair price and that if maintained about that level it is reasonable for the consumer of the raw rubber and will afford a fair margin of profit to the producer. The Stevenson scheme went into operation on November 1, 1922. The world stock of crude rubber was large at the time and, of course, it took a considerable length of time before the effect of the restriction scheme was felt to any great extent. Now, just let me read the average prices of raw rubber by quarters and it will be seen that the price remained well below 36 cents up to 1925. Here are the figures:

	Cents
Nov. 1, 1922, to Jan. 31, 1923	27⅝
Feb. 1, 1923, to Apr. 30, 1923	32½
May 1, 1923, to July 31, 1923	27⅛
Aug. 1, 1923, to Oct. 31, 1923	28
Nov. 1, 1923, to Jan. 31, 1924	25½
Feb. 1, 1924, to Apr. 30, 1924	23¾
May 1, 1924, to July 31, 1924	20
Aug. 1, 1924, to Oct. 31, 1924	27½
Nov. 1, 1924, to Jan. 31, 1925	36
Feb. 1, 1925, to Apr. 30, 1925	38
May 1, 1925, to July 31, 1925	115

You will note that from February 1 to April 30, 1925, rubber went to 38 cents and the next quarter commencing May 1, 1925, is when it jumped to $1.15. What happened was that the manufacturers first became panicky and then became speculative. This condition coupled with a situation for speculation which the American manufacturers themselves created naturally caused this abnormal and artificial rise in prices. The American manufacturers rushed into the market in the belief at the beginning of the May quarter of 1925 that the requirements for raw rubber would be greater than the supply. It is a well-known fact that representatives of American manufacturers were bidding against each other and the president of one large tire company stated in London in the month of August, 1925, that he expected rubber would go to $2 a pound. All buyers commenced to hedge, with the result that some companies made a great deal of money out of this wild market while others lost a great deal. I repeat that none of this excess price reached the pockets of the rubber producers. After the market broke and rubber prices fell to a normal level the manufacturers admitted at the time that the wild condition of the market was the result of speculative buying.

It did not take long for the market to go down to a normal level. Then the purchasing pool was formed and it simply dovetailed in with the Stevenson plan and kept prices slightly higher than a normal level. In other words, it is generally conceded, and rubber men have so stated, that with all of the Stevenson plan, without a purchasing pool, the price of rubber in 1927 would have been 25 cents and not higher than 30 cents a pound. It is only natural, gentlemen, that the corporations in this buying pool or combination are not in it for love or for any altruistic purpose. They will see to it, you can be sure, that they get their supply first and then will hedge and keep the market up so that they may have an advantage over their competitors not in the pool. Now, if this pool is legalized and they have no fear of coming in conflict with the existing antitrust laws by restraining trade they will go a great deal further and they will so monopolize the market as to make the price of raw rubber prohibitive to any competitor or to any consumer of raw rubber outside of their pool or combination. In other words, if this bill becomes a law we can make a list of the tire companies and automobile companies that are in the pool, draw a line, and note the fact that it will be impossible for any new undertaking, for any new concern, for the manufacture of tires or automobiles, to establish. And the companies not in the pool will either be driven under control or out of business.

Now I ask you where does the consuming public come in? And while we are on this point of the public including the farmers, if you please, whose alleged representative told the committee that the passage of this bill would be of great benefit to the farmer, let me suggest a mere casual comparison of the price of raw rubber from the list that I have just quoted and from the quotations given by the sponsors of this bill with the price of tires. I invite any sponsor of this bill to show where the public has been benefited by the low price of rubber reflecting in a lower price of tires. It is stated that it is difficult, if not impossible, for the price of rubber to be directly reflected in the price of tires. If that is so, then where will the public benefit any by the passage of this bill? When pressed for a statement showing how low prices of rubber would reflect in lower prices of tires this is the answer which is given, and let me say that it will be found on page 293 of the hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, held in January, 1926. The committee was told that it was extremely difficult to make any determination of that kind. Now let me read:

There are one hundred and thirty and odd different sizes and types of tires, of which every manufacturer claims a different quality; and say there are 25 principal manufacturers, you have therefore somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,000 different articles. Each manufacturer gets out his own price list, and they differ from every other manufacturer, so one can not connect it up with each other. Now, if you attempt to take the price lists of to-day and compare them with the price lists of a year ago for the whole of American manufacturers you will find yourself immediately in the difficulty of trying to compare articles of dissimilar character from the trade point of view, and we have not been able to come to any particular conclusion in the matter. If you take the price lists of the same manufacturer and compare them you can determine the increase of that manufacturer, but then you have the difficulty of determining what he paid for rubber, for they all differ in their purchases.

That is about as intricate, involved, complicated an explanation as could be given, and gentleman, that is their answer. Now let me read this significant paragraph:

I could make this observation, I think, that would be approximately correct, that the tendency of all manufacturers, in the face of highly speculative prices, is to advance their prices of commodities to the spot quotations, and sometimes they have supplies contracted for previously at lower prices; and therefore one manufacturer who was fortunate in having supplies at a lower price might get unusual advantage out of a certain market rise. On the other hand, the manufacturer who had no supplies at all, and was compelled to buy from day to day in the market, would not secure that advantage. The tendency to follow spot prices is almost universal in speculative markets because of the fear of sudden drops in price, in which a large inventory would have to be depreciated.

That being so, the manufacturers do not lose and the public gets it coming and going. Where is the benefit to the public that the supporters of this bill have been talking about?

A great deal has been said about this so-called monopoly. I repeat what I have said several times before that there is no monopoly as we understand that word. The Stevenson plan provides for the amount of production and a flexible tax to control production. The plan does not provide nor will anyone claim that there is but one source of supply. If this were a monopoly as some of the sponsors of the bill are claiming, there would be but one source, one place where American buyers could go and buy. As a matter of fact, there are several British wholesale rubber dealers, there are dozens of large brokers, and there is a rubber exchange in London, in New York, and other centers besides daily auction sales of rubber at Antwerp, Singapore, and Colombo. Quoting from Marketing of Crude Rubber, issued by our own Department of Commerce, there are also many rubber brokers "specializing in buying and selling rubber on margin for speculators." The large rubber companies engaged in selling wholesale quantities to American consumers are located in London, Paris, Hamburg, Amsterdam, and New York. In fact, competition is very keen at times. In addition to the British supply, of course, there is the Dutch supply.

Now, anticipating what my friends in support of this bill may say that the Dutch and the British may combine—which, of course, is so remote and impossible that it need not be considered—yet let us assume that there is no Dutch supply, or let us assume that they will combine. You see I am willing to take the most unfavorable position and the extreme possibilities that may confront our importers of rubber and still insist that we are absolutely in no danger. Now why? For the very reason that has been stated on the floor over 50 times in the course of this debate. We are the largest consumers of rubber. We take over 70 per cent of the entire output of the world. That being so, we are not at the mercy of the producers, but the producers are at the mercy rather of the American consumers. If we only used 30 per cent of the output and the producers could combine against the American consumer; then, indeed, they could dispose of their 70 per cent and hold out for any price to the American consumer. But the reverse is true; if the American consumer is not in the market to buy, the producers go broke. They simply can not afford to hold out against us. Again I invite an examination of the prices after the Stevenson plant went into effect, which I have just read, and you will see that the price was maintained well under 36 cents up to the time that the American speculators themselves skyrocketed the price. Whenever the prices are too high, all American consumers have to do is to withhold purchases for a few weeks and, buying 70 per cent of the output, that in itself brings down the price. Rubber producers in the British and Dutch colonies are in business to make money and to live; they can not afford to keep back their products. They must convert into cash every season's crops, so that it is the rubber producers of the foreign countries that are at our mercy a great deal more than any danger under existing conditions of the American buyer being at their mercy.

What has been said about the antitrust law is true. If you are prepared now to change the policy of the Government and let down the bars and repeal the purpose and intent of the antitrust laws, vote for this bill. In 1918 we did amend the antitrust laws to the extent of permitting combinations and associations engaged solely in export trade, but we were told that that was a necessary war measure, that by reason of the fact of conditions in Europe, by reason of the fact of our entry into the war, it would be an economic advantage for the export trade doing business with South America—that was the point at the time, if you will remember. I was then a young Member of the House. The arguments presented are still fresh in my memory. It was argued that as a matter of economy, to meet war conditions we should permit this one exception to the antitrust laws, and on that assurance we voted for the Webb-Pomerene Act. But some Members of the House pointed out, as for instance, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], now at the other end of the Capitol, and the ranking Republican member of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. Volstead, and others, that this would be the beginning of a breakdown of all our antitrust laws; and lo, and behold, they were right. I dare say that the real purpose when the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee held its hearings in 1926 was to get a bill of this kind, but that committee would not dare report out such a bill.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. It was not the purpose when this proposition was reported to report out any legislation. It was purely an investigational proposition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the committee made recommendations?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did the committee recommend an amendment to the antitrust laws to permit a pool or association in import trade?

Mr. NEWTON. No; and I wish the gentleman at this point would read just what we did say and the reasons why.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Is the gentleman entitled to decline to yield to a member of the committee?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, my colleague from New York does not know the rules.

Mr. WELLER. I yielded to the gentleman yesterday.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can strike that out.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, I never strike anything out. Mr. Chairman, the "poor" rubber companies, the "struggling" General Motors Corporation, and these other "tottering" corporations now say they need our help, because we have never done anything for them. Of course, you gentlemen all remember that we appropriated $500,000 for the rubber companies with which to make a study of the source of supply. Not a word is said about that. Four hundred thousand dollars was spent by the Department of Commerce and $100,000 by the Department of Agriculture, with the representatives of the tire companies of this country. And a survey of the entire world was made. And what resulted? That survey resulted in one rubber company going into the rubber-raising business and another rubber company buying land in the Republic of Liberia.

It was also found that the Philippines was ideal territory for growing rubber and some of the companies are ready to go there. But listen to this, because it will give you an idea of the arrogance of these companies: They are ready to go into the Philippines provided the Filipinos change their structure of government! That is all they asked. They even want the government of the Philippines changed to suit General Motors and Firestone tires.

Now, let me submit this argument to you: Here you have one rubber company, now a part of the present existing pool, and this rubber company has now under cultivation $35,000,000 worth of land, raising their own rubber, and they are now raising 25 per cent of their own requirements. The other rubber company will soon obtain rubber from their own source of supply in Liberia. The result of the investigation for which we appropriated $500,000 indicated that they could go into the Philippines; and they say they will go into the Philippines, I repeat, if the Filipinos will change their structure of government!

So we have one rubber company producing 25 per cent of its own requirements; another rubber company with vast holdings in Liberia which will very shortly produce an enormous amount of rubber; other companies soon to acquire their own rubber plantations. The companies that are already in the rubber-raising business form part of the pool which it is sought to make permanent by this legislation. Do you realize now, gentlemen, why they are so anxious to pass this bill? Why, of course, a combination buying rubber and producing rubber—soon producing rubber on a large scale—would simply mean the absolute control and monopoly of the rubber, tire, and automobile business of this country.

Now, gentlemen say: Why do you, in your discussion, limit yourself to the matter of rubber? Because that is all there is in the bill at this time. Sisal and potash were put in there for window dressing. That was a sop to your farmers. You said, "Oh, yes; we will give you farm relief," and so you put in sisal and potash.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not now.

The Secretary of Commerce testified that in Yucatan they have a government monopoly on sisal, and they also testified that nine different States had already created their own agencies for buying sisal. If they have done that, as I said before, there is no law to prevent the nine from combining as a purchasing pool, because they are not engaged in the purchase for profit. That eliminates sisal entirely.

Now, as to potash, this is what the report says—if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], who is trying to convince the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]—here is your report. It is a good report. I read the sixth recommendation:

It is recommended that Congress bring to an early settlement the Muscle Shoals question. Such action will give protection to the American consumer of nitrate, both because Muscle Shoals is now an unknown and deterring factor to our growing nitrogen industry, and because undoubtedly that plant itself will be used for nitrogen production.

"Oh, wise judge! A Daniel comes to judgment!" That is what I have been saying for the last seven or eight years, but you would not go along with me.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. I yielded to the gentleman myself several times. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD there what I said I would do, and that is the comment of our committee on this proposition, instead of quoting something about Muscle Shoals?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is in the report.

Mr. NEWTON. You referred to it, but you have not read it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is a good report, and a constructive report. The gentleman should not become angry with me because I am praising his report. [Laughter.] I will now read the entire recommendations made by the committee. I said before and I say it now, it is constructive, it was effective, it obtained results, but it made no such extreme recommendation as is contained in the bill now before us which would create one of the most powerful and most vicious of monopolies. Here is the entire recommendation of the committee:

The problem of remedies is indeed most difficult. These governmental controls violate economic principles. They stifle the growth of producing industries and stimulate the use of inferior substitutes among consumers. Furthermore, they violate other than economic principles. Their disturbing influence upon international good will can not be overlooked and is, in fact, one of the most important objections to them. The friendly intercourse of nations would be better and more soundly based if these controls were wholly abolished. We commend the efforts our Government has made to induce an abolishment of these controls and urge renewed watchfulness and continued endeavor to accomplish that result.

If we consider the problem wholly from the point of view of domestic correctives, we have four alternative remedies:

The first is to secure immediate relief from high prices by conservation and substitution campaigns among our consumers, such as the very successful rubber conservation campaign for which the Department of Commerce is responsible.

The second is by governmental and private action to create an independent source of supply which can not be brought under foreign control.

The third is for American citizens to refuse to furnish credit to these controls.

The fourth is direct retaliation in some form.

With these alternatives in mind, the committee reaches the following conclusions:

1. It has been proved in the case of rubber that a conservation campaign can be conducted by the American people as a protest against high artificially controlled prices and with a fair degree of success. This experience is of considerable significance in showing the ability of the consumer to take matters into his own hands, and secure some measure of protection through exercising positive control over demand.

As a result of this demonstration, the committee believes that a considerable measure of protection can be attained in this way for the American consumer. While the committee believes that it is desirable to give time for consideration by foreign governments of the undesirability of such combination before resorting to legislation in the United States, yet if the American consumer should be further subjected to unfair prices, the committee believes that further and more extended efforts as to carrying on conservation campaigns should be systematically organized and carried out. If necessary, the Government should assist.

2. The ultimate solution of the problem of foreign control of commodities essential to American industries and progress will unquestionably be for the United States to become more self-efficient in their supply through endeavoring to produce these commodities for itself, either under its own flag or in suitable foreign countries which would agree not to interrupt free trading in them at any time. In effecting such agreements, the governmental facilities of the United States should freely assist.

3. For growing rubber under the American flag, the southern Philippines appear most suitable. Physical conditions are known to be excellent. Under the existing Philippine land laws, the holdings of individuals or corporations are limited to about 2,500 acres. This condition could be altered by the Philippine Legislature or by the Congress of the United States if it chose to change the basic law under which the islands are now administered. Furthermore, certain experiments have recently been undertaken to develop the production of rubber from the guayale shrub in the Southwestern States. For several years rubber has been produced from this wild shrub in Mexico. In 1925 our imports of this rubber amounted to 8,469,123 pounds. The committee believes that these experiments contain such possibilities as to warrant serious attention and consideration.

Outside American territory, good possibilities for successful rubber culture appear to exist in the Isthmus of Darien in the Republic of Panama, the Canal Zone, Brazil, Colombia, and other parts of tropical America. Plantations in such locations would be especially valuable to the United States from the standpoint of national defense, since rubber from them would more likely be uninterruptedly available in the event of war. Substantial progress is also being made in Liberia by American interests. As a step in the direction of assuring such supplies, the committee specifically recommends that the Department of Agriculture be authorized and enabled, in cooperation with their respective governments, to establish and maintain demonstration rubber plantations in South and Central American countries. Certain suggestions were made in this connection to the committee by Dr. H. N. Whitford, formerly crude rubber expert for the Department of Commerce.

4. Efforts of the Bureau of Standards and others to develop a synthetic rubber and other synthetic products should be further encouraged.

5. The committee considers that opportunity exists for the development of the potash resources of the United States, and believes that support should be given to the Bureau of Mines or the Geological Survey for the exploration of potash deposits in Texas, Utah, and possibly other States.

6. It is recommended that Congress bring to an early settlement the Muscle Shoals question. Such action will give protection to the American consumer of nitrate, both because Muscle Shoals is now an unknown and deterring factor to our growing nitrogen industry and because undoubtedly that plant itself will be used for nitrogen production.

7. The committee recommends that the Department of Agriculture be encouraged to further investigate the possibilities of producing sisal in continental United States or its insular possessions and to make experimental plantations for this purpose.

8. Since these governmental controls are contrary to the interests of the American consumer, the committee takes the position that American citizens should refuse to aid or assist them by extending credit to them. This is obvious. Furthermore, self-interest should prompt this action on the part of American financial interests, for the granting of loans of this character would create a just resentment against them on the part of the American public. In some instances requests for loans of this character have been refused. In at least one instance the loan has been granted. Requests for loans should be discouraged and if made should be refused.

9. Retaliation by the United States against these governmental controls was not given serious attention by the committee and will not be except as a last resort.

10. The committee has received suggestions that Congress give direct aid to development by American citizens of alternate supplies of these raw materials but takes the position that aid or subsidy of this sort is inadvisable, partly because it is an intrusion of government into production, against the principle of which this investigation is directed.

11. Suggestions made to the committee that it secure passage of a law permitting combination of American purchasers to buy cooperatively are not approved at this time. Such action is not urgently demanded by the trades concerned.

12. The committee, for reasons heretofore appearing, has not at this time suggested remedial legislation since it believes that a frank discussion of these questions and the development of a better understanding of the consequences of the intrusion of governmental price controls in international trade may secure an abandonment of the practices. If, however, it develops that the American public can not be protected against a repetition of its experiences in the past by resort to methods mentioned above, the committee will have no hesitation in reopening the question. Accordingly the committee makes this preliminary report with the purpose of making further report to the House later if the occasion should require it.

Right on the subject of Muscle Shoals, let me state to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] that his committee was absolutely right at the time. The Power Trust which is in existence has been doing everything possible to keep the Government from operating Muscle Shoals for fertilizer. Finally, the Senate passed the Norris bill and the Military Affairs Committee of the House are now reporting a bill along the same lines which would finally utilize Muscle Shoals, and the best proof that the fertilizer manufacturers know what is going to happen is the concerted and organized drive now being conducted by the fertilizer group against the Muscle Shoals plan as contained in the House bill. If we want to use Muscle Shoals for power, it is the Power Trust fighting legislation. If we attempt to use Muscle Shoals as a fertilizer plant, then it is the fertilizer crowd opposing legislation. Now real friends of the farmers will get back of the Muscle Shoals bill about to be reported to the House and not back of this sham bill pretending to help the farmer, but which will squeeze him and mulct him and exploit him even more. Just let me read this letter from one of our fertilizer friends. It will bear out exactly what I say, and it will bear out the recommendations contained in the report of the Committee of Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

ONEIDA, N. Y., April 5, 1928.

HON. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We vigorously protest against the Government going into the fertilizer business and therefore in particular protest against the House Military Affairs Committee's substitute for the Norris bill.

This amendment substitute, Union Calendar No. 394, Senate Joint Resolution 46, strikes viciously, with destructive probabilities, the fertilizer industry, in which we are engaged.

As considerable taxpayers, we call to your attention this confiscatory proposed legislation and ask your support that our Government will not be empowered to manufacture for sale and free distribution fertilizers in unfair competition with the present economic industry.

If an industry distressed because of the present economic condition of the farmer is to be completely crippled by unfair Government competition, it seems unlikely that the farmers would be served properly without a real substitute in fact for our entire industry.

We believe the enactment of the proposed legislation referred to will result in the destruction of a worthy industry and will not establish in its stead the necessary service to the farmer.

Very truly yours,

THE BAUGH & SONS CO.,
DANIEL BAUGH BREWSTER,
Vice President.

You will observe that they protest against the present plan of using Muscle Shoals for the production of fertilizers because they say they can make fertilizer down there so much cheaper as to put them out of business. If it keeps the former in business, we are satisfied.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman from New York the only Republican on that side who is fighting this monopoly?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no. All the thinking Republicans on this side are fighting it. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. If this corporation is formed to deal with an emergency, why does not the bill say that the corporation shall be dissolved when the emergency ceased?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, that is not the purpose of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Its purpose is to make it a permanent matter?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS], who is a good lawyer, says if they should enhance the price they would be violating the antitrust law. Every lawyer in the House knows that a penal statute is strictly construed, and if you provide any penalty for any violation of the provisions contained in this bill you have got to provide it in the bill itself. You can not do anything else. But what does this bill do? If the association or pool is found to be profiteering or violating the mild admonition contained here, that they must not do anything to enhance prices, if they do that, one must go for redress to the Federal Trade Commission.

Then what does the Federal Trade Commission do according to the bill? They say, "You must not do that, but you must change your methods of operation." Then if they fail to change their methods of operation it is provided that the matter shall be referred to the Attorney General. To do what? To prosecute under a law designated in the bill? Oh, no. "For such action as he may deem proper." I leave it to any attorney here if that is the way to put teeth in a law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is well understood that I am one of those Members who do not take much time on the floor of the House. We all know that the real work of Congress is done in committee, and by reason of the consideration of this bill in committee, of which I am a member, I have become much interested in the object sought to be attained.

In the first place, I had serious doubts as to the advisability of further amending our antitrust laws, but after consideration and investigation I reached the conclusion that this proposed amendment is most desirable, and I am sure in my own mind that this act, if put into effect, must inure to the benefit of the consumer of the commodities affected. The bill is so framed that it seems to me that this result is assured.

The Sherman antitrust law was enacted in 1890 and has been amended on several occasions. I believe most sincerely in the original act and believe that the amendments have been timely, and I am just as sure that the advocates of this measure appreciate the efficacy of the act. Conditions, however, throughout the country and the world have changed since 1890. In 1918 this Congress amended the Sherman antitrust law by the enactment of the so-called Webb-Pomerene law, which my good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has designated as a war measure. I challenge the correctness of such designation and bring as my proof the arguments on the floor of the House when the Webb-Pomerene law was being debated by the House. It is true that one or two Members who were opposed to the bill did say that the amendment was offered as a war-time measure, but this was by no means the theory on which the House passed the act. The debate at that time shows clearly that the Webb-Pomerene law was enacted for the purpose of promoting export trade after the war and to make it possible for American producers to compete in the world market and thereby profitably dispose of our surplus products and commodities. It was necessary that the antitrust law be amended in order that our exporters might be placed on an even footing with foreign competitors in world markets. The Webb-Pomerene law was passed by a vote of 29 to 247, as I remember it. It was fathered by and enacted by almost unanimous vote of the Members on the Democratic side of the House, and most of the Republicans joined with you, and I know of no one or no interest in the United States to-day regretting the enactment of the Webb-Pomerene law. The wisdom of your action has been proven by the working of the law. Conditions have arisen at this time when it seems necessary that the wise provisions of the Webb-Pomerene law be extended so as to cover import trade in certain commodities. This bill, H. R. 8927, reenacts the Webb-Pomerene law without changing its language or meaning one iota, but adds to the bill provisions granting certain exemptions from the Sherman antitrust law favorable to American importers dealing in certain commodities.

The bill provides:

That the words "import trade," wherever used in this act, mean solely trade or commerce in crude rubber, potash, sisal, and other raw materials or products of nature in a crude or unfinished state, imported, or in the course of being imported into the United States or any Territory thereof from any foreign nation, which are certified by the Secretary of Commerce to be of a character not made, produced, or grown in sufficient quantities within the United States, and to be controlled by any foreign government, combination, or monopoly.

If this bill becomes a law this act in itself will not give vitality to any combination, association, or group. It is merely permissive, and those desiring to take advantage of its terms must make application to the Secretary of Commerce, and if after that officer has investigated he is satisfied that a certificate should issue as in the provision of the law to which I have just called your attention is provided, then it will be possible for the associations to organize and begin operating. Let me impress upon you that the enactment of this law in itself will have no effect upon the rubber-buying pool which is now operating. A certificate will be as readily issued to the importer of potash, nitrates, and sisal as to the importers of rubber if the Secretary of Commerce is satisfied of the necessity.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Why allow the corporation to exist beyond the time when the monopoly is controlled by a foreign government?

Mr. MICHENER. This is a very apt question. I raised the question in the committee. I felt that there should be some limitation on the life of the pool, if the necessity for its existence ceased. The committee was not unanimous in this matter, and I think that amendments will be offered to take care of this situation. I shall be very glad to assist the gentleman in an amendment along this line.

Now, just a word about the buying pool which is to-day operating in the purchase of rubber for the American market. My good friend from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING]—and he is one of the best lawyers in the House, and as a general proposition I agree with him on legal matters in the committee—says that this pool is operating in contravention of law. I do not understand this to be the fact. The truth is that when the price of rubber had reached an unreasonably high level, and after the Stevenson control was formed by the British, the American users of rubber began to try to figure out some way whereby rubber might be had in America at somewhere near its actual cost to the consumer, plus a legitimate profit to those engaged in the industry. The advice of the Department of Justice was sought, and the Secretary of Commerce and the foreign trades section of the Department of Commerce were interviewed, and it was finally agreed that those using raw rubber in America should combine their purchasing power, and this they did, and are operating under this arrangement at this time.

Under the Sherman Act every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal. There is no suggestion that this combination has made any money. There is no suggestion that our trade is in any way restrained, or our commerce interfered with, and this buying power has unquestionably operated in the interests of the American user of rubber and, in my judgment, these operations have saved millions to our consumers, and I am sure that the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission are in contact with just what is being done by this combination, and we need have no fear of a violation of the spirit of the Sherman antitrust law by these people. The price of rubber has not only been stabilized in this country but it has been reduced from $1.20 a pound to 21 cents a pound on yesterday. Personally I shall be wonderfully surprised if rubber remains at 21 cents a pound for any length of time. The committee was told by those who had properly investigated, and who had knowledge on the subject, that 36 cents a pound is a fair and reasonable price, allowing every one connected with the industry a fair and reasonable profit, and if this is correct then it would seem that 21 cents a pound must be below the cost of production, or so dangerously near that the producer could not continue to survive.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. No; not at this time.

The English control has not been abandoned. A gesture toward abandonment, plus an unprecedented low spot market, is the answer to the United States users' effort to protect against unconscionable price of rubber. Let us hope that this condition continues, but let us prepare in the meantime.

Maybe it will never be necessary to put this law into operation, but we surely should have the weapon if it is needed. This is not a political question, and let us not be controlled by promises or hope for political advantages, and in this connection I do not refer to Republicans and Democrats alone but have reference to blocs and groups within our midst. It is immaterial to me who favors the bill or who are its principal advocates. The question we should decide is: Is the legislation meritorious? Are the interests of all the people protected? And if we so believe then our duty is clear, and I hope that the center aisle in this body will not be the dividing line so far as support or opposition to the bill is concerned.

If I recall correctly, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING] indicated that the farmer could not combine. How about the Capper-Volstead law? I think the gentleman from Alabama helped to enact that law. There we permitted the farmer to combine for cooperative selling of his commodities. He was already doing this but in order that there be no question about the interference with the Sherman antitrust law, we passed a permissive act, just as we are attempting to pass H. R. 8927 for the purpose of removing all doubt.

This legislation is not an inovation. We are not striking at the vitals of our antitrust laws. We have taken care of the farmer, and I would say to my friend from Wisconsin that we have taken care of labor in the Clayton amendment to the antitrust laws. I have no fault to find with any of these amendments, although there were always those who insisted that the enactment of any amendment being considered meant the death of the Sherman antitrust law.

The phrases "trust," "corporation," "predatory interests," and the like, have no terror for me. We are doing things in this country to-day on a large scale and we must recognize this fact, and a corporation is just as necessary in our economic life as is an individual. Regulatory laws are not only proper but necessary.

Extensive publicity has been given to the consideration of this bill, and in the hearings before the committee no one appeared in opposition. Mr. L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange, and Mr. Chester Gray, legislative representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation, both made splendid arguments for the bill and in behalf of agriculture. The Automobile Chamber of Commerce, which represents the automobile industry from the driver of the car to the manufacturer of the car, is unitedly for the bill. The Secretary of Agriculture indorses this bill. The only way this attempts to fix prices is to prevent foreign monopoly to fix the price too high. I am wondering when the farm relief bill comes up on the floor how these people who are to-day objecting to price fixing by legislation will talk and vote.

More safeguards are thrown around the import provisions of this bill than are thrown around the export provisions of the Webb-Pomerene law. All powers granted to the Federal Trade Commission are brought into play in enforcing obedience to this law. All punishments and penalties provided for in the Sherman antitrust law and the Federal Trade Commission act are applicable and can be inflicted upon associations set up by virtue of this act, provided the terms of the act are not properly complied with.

I intend to support this measure because I believe it is in the interests of the consuming public; and while so far as rubber is concerned, to-day's prices would not indicate the necessity of any action on our part, yet, as I said before, these prices are but temporary, and no harm can come from this legislation if properly enforced. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I would like to have your attention for five minutes, because I want to call your attention to the fundamentals of this bill. I am not going to rave and tear my hair, but I do want your attention to consider just what the bill means. To my mind it is a very simple matter, as a member on the committee that reported this bill and having a full knowledge of the merits of this bill, I shall not wander from what are the facts in the case, and I want to make this statement of the facts.

You all understand that the United States, the greatest nation in the world, has a large trade with other nations, both import and export. The tariff act protects us on everything but the three articles named in this bill—rubber, sisal, and potash. I should be very pleased to vote for a high tariff sufficient to keep these products out of this country and establish our own potash industry in our own country. We have potash here, and we should mine our own potash and grow our own sisal and produce our own rubber in our own possessions, but we have not yet reached that point.

This is an emergency measure. England knows what is going on here, and her Parliament knows what is going on in our Congress. They know we have something under consideration here in this bill that is going to prevent them from having a monopoly on rubber, and therefore down comes the price of rubber.

Fifty-three fertilizer companies in this country in combination with other concerns over in Germany control potash simply because we can not compete with them. Sisal is controlled by individuals in this country the same as potash and in the same way rubber is controlled by individuals, and you can not attack them under the Sherman law. But this bill has for its purpose authorizing under the Sherman antitrust law corporations of individuals that will fight them with organizations on this side to protect our market and our people.

Now, I am a great believer in monopolies, but all under the control of the United States in the United States. Monopoly uncontrolled is a bad thing, but controlled it is a good thing. Are we going to control this? Just read the bill. If you have time to read some of the sections of the bill, turn to page 3, where a monopoly, after having received a certificate from the Secretary of Commerce, you say, is going to run wild. Will it? Look at page 3, line 21:

Provided, That such association, agreement, or act is not in restraint of trade within the United States, and is not in restraint of the export trade of any domestic competitor of such association: And provided further, That such association does not, either in the United States or elsewhere, enter into any agreement, understanding, or conspiracy, or do any act which artificially or intentionally enhances or depresses prices within the United States of commodities of the class exported by such association, or which substantially lessens competition within the United States or otherwise restrains trade therein.

Do you not understand that? Is not that plain? Then the bill provides, beginning at line 19 on page 4:

Provided, That such association does not, either in the United States or elsewhere, enter into any agreement, understanding, or conspiracy to do any act which enhances prices within the United States of commodities of the class imported by such association, or of products manufactured in whole or in part therefrom, or which otherwise substantially lessens competition within the United States, or otherwise restrains trade therein.

Then turn over to page 7, where you will find that any association that shall fail to obey this law or is found to be a conspiracy in restraint of trade shall not have the benefit of the provisions of sections 2 and 3 but shall forfeit to the United States $100 for each and every day of its violation.

Then, on page 7, line 17, it puts these combinations that are a monopoly, as you say, or a pool, under the Federal Trade Commission. If the commission believes that they are violating the law, they shall investigate them; and if they find a violation report it to the Attorney General of the United States for such action as he may deem proper. Why, men, how can we for a moment hesitate when we see that this is our weapon to protect ourselves from a monopoly abroad that enhances prices in America on articles necessary and which we can not at this time produce in sufficient quantities. By this bill we control the monopoly more than anything I ever saw put into a law. How can the bill do anything to hurt the United States? How can the bill harm us? Gentlemen, you will find that when this bill is passed the price of rubber will stay down—not for 24 hours, but while this remains a law. You will find that potash prices will come down; you will find that the prices of sisal will come down; and you will find that we have protected by this useful legislation the people of our country that the Members of this House are sworn to protect. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I have no sympathy whatever with those American citizens who are always afraid that some of their fellow citizens may be able to earn a decent return upon the capital that they have invested in their business. It is similar to the spirit that finds fault with our country, with our Constitution, with our form of government, always finding that some other form of government is better than ours. We have had a lot of that kind of teaching in some of our schools and colleges.

It seems to be fashionable in some quarters to look with equanimity upon the foreign capitalists and foreign business men who are combining to control the prices of things that we do not produce in this country, so that they can have the American people at their mercy. We remember what happened in the case of sugar when the Cuban syndicate forced us to pay 25 cents a pound for sugar. We know what has recently happened in rubber when a British combination forced the American people to pay outrageous prices for this necessary commodity.

Now, this bill is designed to enable the American business man to meet that sort of thing. There is not one single provision in the bill that can result in any harm to the American consumer. There is nothing in the bill to prevent any group of American manufacturers, large or small, to get together and receive a certificate—in fact, the certificate must be given.

A good deal has been said and will be said about certain large corporations in the United States engaged in the rubber business. I probably have in my district a larger amount of capital invested in the rubber business than almost any other district outside of Akron, Ohio. Of the four leading rubber concerns, one, the American Rubber Co., is affiliated with the United States Rubber Co., a large corporation, but the other three are independent companies. One of them is the Hood Rubber Co. in Watertown, and two of them are in Cambridge—the Boston Woven Hose & Rubber Co., a local concern which has been engaged in business a good many years, and the Cambridge Rubber Co., one of our newer industries.

I have here a letter from the Hood Rubber Co., addressed to Mr. DYER, acting chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, which I wish to read, so the members of the committee can understand that the rubber business as a whole has not been a profitable business for quite a number of years.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 3, 1928.

Congressman LEONIDAS C. DYER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On February 16 we addressed a letter to you relating to House bill No. 8927, the same being an amendment to the Webb-Pomerene Act, and setting forth some reasons why we thought the bill should be enacted.

In further support of our position we call your attention to the following statistical information taken from the Rubber Age, a publication dealing with the affairs of the rubber industry.

For the seven-year period 1918–1924 the net profit of rubber companies after Federal taxes was only 1.71 per cent on gross income, whereas all manufacturing industries taken together netted 4.53 on the same basis.

In 1925 only 54.7 per cent of the rubber companies reported net income, and only 39.3 per cent reported taxable net income.

During the whole period 1918–1924 the industry earned profits only on lines other than tires, tire manufacturing being carried on at a net loss for the seven years. On the average only 31 per cent of the corporations classified as tire manufacturers (including hose and belting companies before 1924) reported net income, 69 per cent reporting deficits.

In round figures tire companies reported net income of $108,000,000 for the 1918–1924 period, against a total deficit of $110,000,000.

Unquestionably the failure of the rubber industry to make a creditable showing in the matter of earnings during the past two and one-half years has been due to the restrictions imposed by the so-called Stevenson Act, referred to in our earlier letter.

We again urge you to use your best efforts to secure the passage of this amendment, and so benefit the rubber industry and the consuming public in general.

Very truly yours,

HOOD RUBBER CO.,
By HAROLD C. HASKELL.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Has the gentleman examined the figures put into the RECORD yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] with reference to the huge earnings of most of the important companies, showing that they have gradually increased from 1923, until we have the staggering figures of profit of such companies as the Firestone Tire Co. of over $5,000,000 in 1927 and of over $6,000,000 for the United States Rubber Co.?

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I care nothing about those figures. Although as a matter of fact the figures which the gentleman gives are certainly not excessive in relation to the capital invested. But I am pleading for the American rubber companies as a whole, particularly the smaller ones, who want a chance to obtain rubber cheap; and they are the ones who have asked me to support this bill and I am glad to do it. I have examined the bill very carefully, and I am satisfied that there is nothing in it which endangers in any way the American consumer. On the contrary, the interests of the consuming public are amply protected. I trust that this House will do something to help our citizens who are engaged in legitimate business to obtain a square deal in competition with these great combinations and monopolies abroad to the end that the automobile user and the purchaser of rubber goods of all kinds, as well as the American farmer who must have potash and binding twine, may obtain these necessary commodities at a reasonable price.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] indicated that the price of rubber was brought down through this combination that was formed. If that is the case, if that combination brought down the price of rubber under existing law, what is the reason for the enactment of this bill?

Mr. DALLINGER. I do not know anything about what the gentleman refers to, as I was not in the Chamber when the gentleman from Michigan spoke. I know this, however, that when we passed the Webb-Pomerene Act and permitted combinations of exporters, these same arguments were made against that bill; and we were told that it would result in a grievous monopoly that would oppress the American people, and none of those predictions have come true.

Mr. SCHAFER. I am not referring to that, but the gentleman from Michigan stated that the price of rubber was brought down under existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, if any Member of this House is laboring under the impression that he is going to help the man who wears out rubber tires on his automobile by voting for this bill and allowing the big rubber processers to combine to buy their products, he is laboring under a day dream, because none of that profit will ever reach the consumer of the rubber tire. I think the gentleman who just left the floor, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], let the cat out of the bag. He wants the rubber concerns making rubber tires in his district to make more money. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the trouble with the independent tire concerns in his territory is the fact that they are being squeezed out by the great rubber combinations against whose competition those small independent concerns can not live. Last year the rubber concerns made good earnings. Their stocks are selling well. They are able to carry along and increase their equipment all along the line. Do not think as a Member of this House that you are going to contribute to the men who are using tires when you vote for this bill? You are simply voting here an indorsement of the pool combination that has been formed by the big rubber companies in order that they may carry on what they call stabilizing rubber negotiations in order to purchase the product that they want. Of course, they were caught with not enough rubber on hand when the Stevenson plan was put into effect, and they found that they were responsible more than any other one element in this country for the high price of rubber, because immediately they all said, "We must have rubber," and in that way contributed more than any other factor to the skyrocketing of prices. The rubber they had on hand they purchased at a low price, and when they made it up and sold it at a price equal to what they would have been justified in charging if they had paid a dollar and twenty cents, they sold for that much more profit. The reason why this bill is here now under pressure is because these same concerns have bought large quantities of rubber. They see now that that does not tend to stabilize the price and carry on the high level. They want their combination recognized by law so that they can come in and protect themselves and try to show to the great American people that they are their archangels and friends in the matter of protecting them in the purchase of their rubber tires. If you are going to establish those people as the guardians of the interest of the American people in purchasing their rubber tires, then you are going to continue to pay a big profit on tires.

I was interested in the insinuation of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] about a bloc that was going to oppose this bill. Mr. Chairman, if there is any bloc in this House which functions any more efficiently than the automobile bloc from the State of Michigan, I have never been introduced to it since I have been a Member of the House. [Applause.]

This bill is tremendously far-reaching. The necessity for this legislation has passed. We do not need to become the guardians of any of these tire firms. The Goodrich Co. last year made $12 a share earnings on their stock. The necessity for the high price of rubber is gone. We are now buying rubber at about 21 or 22 cents a pound; and why this great demand here that we be permitted to form a combination in order to increase our purchasing power abroad?

Mr. STOBBS. And how long have we been paying 20 cents a pound for rubber?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. It was quoted at 21 cents yesterday, as I understand.

Mr. STOBBS. How long has that been the price?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. It has been gradually coming down. That is the greatest argument against this whole procedure. Regardless of these things the price of rubber has declined, and there is no reason for anybody being afraid that it is not going to continue to decline in price.

Mr. STOBBS. The gentleman is making an assertion. But is it not a fact that the price has been twenty-odd cents only in the past few days?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. No. The gentleman is mistaken about that, Mr. Chairman. I do not yield any more.

Let me suggest further that this is the recognition of a principle that we have been fighting against all these years in Congress. It is a recognition of a principle and the giving of a legal status to a species of combination that we have been opposing and trying to make illegal all these years. If we keep on trying here to help any kind of combination that claims it will help stabilize things but is really intended to make profits for the big concerns, we are going to have an accounting when we go before the voters. We should not establish a principle here that permits a monopoly from the viewpoint that you are going to help out a few rubber concerns that happen to be wanting to purchase rubber.

The fact is that 84 per cent of the rubber is bought by the United States. Do you think the foreign concerns are going to quit selling us rubber when they have got it for sale? Such a position is preposterous. They can not get along in the rubber business without the United States as a purchaser.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KING. The gentleman from Iowa has evidently made a study of the bill, and I would like to have his opinion. Will the gentleman enlighten the House as to whether there is any connection between the fact that Mr. Hoover is back of this bill and that Mr. Hoover has the delegation from Michigan?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. I have not that information, and I did not yield for that kind of a question.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING], knowing me, and knowing the delegation from Michigan, will withdraw that question. Does the gentleman from Illinois think this is a political matter?

Mr. KING. Oh, yes. It has politics in it. The whole thing is political. That is why the farmers are interested in it.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further. I can not see how this will benefit the farming population or any other population, those who are actual consumers, and who, it is claimed, will be the beneficiaries of this measure. There is no way by which you can carry it through for the benefit of the consumer. It is simply an organization, a permission to them to form an organization, for the purpose of combining their bargaining power in the purchase of a commodity, and when you adopt this method you immediately say to those countries producing rubber throughout the world, "All you have to do is to get together and sit down in your combination and determine how much you will mulct the American users of tires."

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Is not that exactly what happened with regard to copper?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Absolutely.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. We permitted a combination to be formed.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Precisely. And the very same thing is now being tried with reference to the production of sugar throughout the world, and if we are not careful we will reap the result of a combination of that kind among the producers of sugar.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Was it not the American producers of sugar that tried to prevent the Cuban sugar from coming in?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Yes. Three of the largest tire manufacturers in this country are now extensive producers of rubber in other sections of the world, and what chance has the user of tires got to receive benefits from this proposed law under those conditions?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the provisions in this bill in regard to sisal and potash help the farmer? It appears to me that they will work injury to the farmer instead of benefit.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Yes. The only reason why representatives of farm organizations came in here and advocated the passage of the bill is because they have written into the bill potash and sisal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. I think it was clever on the part of the framers of this measure to put potash and sisal in this bill. It does not change my judgment with reference to the bill at all. As a matter of fact, I think the representatives of farm organizations that have indorsed this bill were thinking about potash and sisal, while the fellows who really wanted the bill passed were thinking solely about rubber.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The farmers' organizations talked about rubber when they were before the committee, and they were the principal ones who talked about rubber.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. I have only a minute or two and I would like to be allowed to make my observations. As a matter of fact, I can not see where there will be any possible benefit to the farmer from the provisions concerning sisal and potash. I do not see why these rubber concerns should be given this kind of legislation or be permitted to go into this kind of a combination. Therefore I am suspicious that the whole "negro in the woodpile" here is the rubber gentleman, who wants permission to do what he pleases and to carry on as he pleases in a way that will not be of benefit to the American consumer, but will be for the benefit of the processors of rubber, and that those processors will be gradually limited to the field of a few big rubber concerns that have already got too many privileges, who are enjoying too many privileges now under the law. I do not see what we can do to stop that sort of combination except to refuse to pass such a bill as this.

But I do say that if you keep on permitting everything that a man or woman uses to be organized into combinations and have the prices fixed by one group of fellows, who can limit the prices at the lower end and take all they want at the upper end, this country is going to have a reckoning the like of which, economically, it has not seen for a good many years. [Applause.]

I want to say that I expect to vote to strike out the enacting clause of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has 11 minutes more at his command and the gentleman from Missouri 16 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN].

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that yesterday general leave was granted to all Members to revise and extend their remarks.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say in advance that I never have been frightened by big business. This cry of monopoly or combination in and of itself has never had any terrors for me. The whole tendency in modern times is toward larger economic units. We can not stop this tide toward concentration. The thing, however, that impresses me about this rubber legislation is that the principle involved goes beyond rubber.

I think we have come to a parting of the ways in American economic history. Only this morning a letter came to my office, and probably you all received the same letter, suggesting that we throw the whole Sherman antitrust law into the ash heap. There is a general feeling in the United States to-day, I believe, that the Sherman law has failed to operate. Business consolidation has gone right on with ever-increasing strides, notwithstanding the Sherman antitrust law.

Do you know that organized labor would like to repeal the Sherman law? Organized labor claims it has been the only class against which the Sherman law, with all of its penalties, has been enforced. Some of the statements made on this floor within the last 24 hours bear testimony to the fact that this big combination, the rubber pool, is permitted to operate contrary to law, with the knowledge and connivance of the Department of Justice and the Secretary of Commerce. That being so, I am going to raise a fundamental question as to whether the Congress of the United States ought not to defer action on this bill and consider the larger problem of repealing the Sherman law in its entirety, giving all classes of the community equal privileges before the law. The minute you begin to confer special privileges on a special group, as in this rubber bill, you incite those special privileges to interest themselves in politics in order to control the Government. The minute you set up a special privilege in the Government you suggest to the economic interests of the country that they control the Presidency, that they control the Federal Trade Commission, and that they control the Department of Justice in order to escape prosecution for exercising the privilege which has been granted. Let me illustrate: We passed a law—Webb-Pomerene Act, 1918—permitting people to combine to export, notwithstanding the Serman law, and not be prosecuted. At that time nobody had any dream that the exporters would combine with foreign combinations for the purpose of holding up and gouging the American public. But that is exactly what happened. We have the very conspicuous instance in which the copper producers in the United States, as exporters, combined with the copper producers all over the world to organize an international copper pool for the purpose of keeping copper prices up all over the world. Is not the same thing going to happen with rubber? I would rather be gouged by an American monopoly than a foreign monopoly. I am for America first [applause], but I do not want to be gouged by anybody. I want to serve notice on you gentlemen that you had better be prepared for an international rubber pool if your rubber pool bill passes. The announcement in the British Houses of Parliament means not that the English people are going to give up their fight for the control of rubber, but that they are going to look to a larger scheme for the control of rubber. I will wager that within the next 12 months the Dutch and the British will be getting together to control rubber prices, and when they do you will find the American rubber pool coming to some sort of an arrangement with them to control the price of rubber all over the world. We are, therefore, embarking upon larger pools than national pools, and if we legalize a pool in this way we have got to be prepared for a world combination.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. Does not the gentleman know that this bill specifically prohibits this combination from entering into any combination in this country or abroad for the purpose of enhancing prices?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Technically, that is so. The language of the bill seems on its surface to protect the American public, and would do so if we had people in office who really intended to enforce the law. [Applause.] The Attorney General of the United States has no more right to let this rubber pool operate to-day than he has to permit a bootlegger to bring liquor into the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], the author of the bill, whether he would be in favor of a pool like this: If you want to protect the American consumer, organize a pool in which the United States Government has an intimate control, and then operate your pool without profit. Are you in favor of that kind of a pool? Are you in favor of a pool which would battle the British and Dutch pool for the benefit of the American consumer? I will join with you in organizing or legalizing that kind of a pool for the protection of American users of rubber products, especially automobile tires. Make it impossible for the rubber companies to join hands with the manufacturers of automobiles. If this bill should become a law, I predict that within another two years you will have a combination of automobile manufacturers and rubber makers, and then what protection has the American consumer? None whatever. We would be at the mercy of a gigantic monopoly. If you want a pool to protect the consumer, let us form a pool in which the United States Government has a more direct interest and one in which you actually forbid international pools and combinations between the automobile manufacturers and the manufacturers of rubber.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I thank the gentleman from Texas. I just want to say this: It is true that this bill does not set up a monopoly. But you do not need an absolute monopoly to control prices. The Steel Corporation and the International Harvester Co. set a price—that is, a minimum price—and when an independent dares to go below that his business is at stake. So when you say this does not create a monopoly, that does not answer the question. You can not deny that it sets up machinery for the control of prices, and the control of prices is what we ought to keep our eyes on.

This is a price-control machine, not for the benefit of the consumers but for the benefit of those who are operating the pool; and later on, for the benefit of the producers in foreign countries and the manufacturers of automobiles in this country. For these reasons I oppose this Newton rubber bill and shall vote against it unless it is radically changed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remainder of the time.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, let us see in what situation we find ourselves. As I stated to the committee in the beginning, when this matter was first presented to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House I had a somewhat sympathetic attitude toward the proposition. If the price of rubber was now where it has been in the past, we would confront a different situation. There would at least be ground for argument. But we come to-day to vote upon this proposition when the reasons which actuated the proponents of the bill no longer exist. Now, that is a fact.

Oh, gentlemen may talk about what is going to happen in the future. They do not know whether it is going to happen or not. But we do know what is the situation to-day. With rubber selling at 21 cents, with the organization gone to pieces, in the face of this sort of a situation we can not afford to enact legislation which will give the consent of this Government to the doing of that which results in a monopoly.

We can not afford to increase the bureaucratic powers of the Government as proposed in this bill, where we send the citizen of the country to the Secretary of Commerce to discover the permissive or prohibitive power of the Government, instead of to the Congress of the United States. We can not afford to go further in this sort of policy as is proposed here, where the private citizen can not inquire beyond the act of the Secretary of Commerce. If the Secretary of Commerce refuses to issue the certificate there is no power of mandamus here. If the Secretary of Commerce issues the certificate when it ought not to be issued, the law enforcement officer of the Government can not go beyond the mandate of the Secretary of Commerce.

In the absence of a present necessity, we ought not to enact the legislation, ought we? That necessity does not exist, does it? This is a queer situation. Rubber went to over a dollar per pound in 1925, but there was no demand for this sort of legislation. Now, with rubber at 21 cents per pound, a dollar per pound under the peak of 1925, we are asked to authorize the formation of a monopoly to protect against high prices of rubber. They ask us to establish a dangerous precedent to ourselves when they are in no present danger. Gentlemen, as I tried to impress in my opening discussion, we can not afford to establish this precedent in international commerce of the organization of pools for the purpose of controlling the price paid for the commodities which must find a market in international commerce. If we do, gentlemen—mark my words—if we do this and we find organized abroad great purchasing pools formed to control the price of our cotton, grain, meat, and other products, we will have to face this bill coming back.

What words can there come to the lips of an American Congressman, what can he say to the Department of State when he finds these great organizations controlling the price of commodities produced by American toil? [Applause.] Can we object when we set the example?

Gentlemen, this is remarkable to me. I have been here 15 years, but I have never seen a situation like this, with the reasons for the legislation gone, with high prices gone, with the foreign pool broken and gentlemen standing here fighting as for their lives for the establishment of a bad precedent in international commerce. I have never seen anything like it since I have been here.

We ought to beat this bill. I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in answer to the statement made by the gentleman from Texas that there is no need for the organization of American citizens to combat foreign selling I state that if that is true, then there will be no excuse for the issuing of a certificate to form such a pool and none would be formed.

Mr. Chairman, this bill has but one purpose, and that is to permit Americans to combine for the purpose of buying in foreign countries in competition with organized foreign monopolies. If such foreign monopolies are not in existence, there will be no need for the legislation; and, Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen will read the bill which is before us, they will see there is every possible protection.

On page 5 of the bill there is the provision:

> No association engaged in such import trade shall discriminate in the sale of or refuse to sell such commodities which it may have for sale to anyone desiring to buy such commodities for use in manufacturing goods in the United States. Nor shall any such association be allowed to accumulate unreasonable stocks of such commodities and withhold the sale thereof for the purpose of enhancing prices thereof.

This bill if enacted into law would be administered under the existing laws of our country, the Sherman antitrust law, the Clayton amendment, and under the Federal Trade Commission. In addition to this we put in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce the authority to issue or to deny a certificate, and they must establish, before a certificate will be issued, the fact that the commodity which they wish to combine to buy in foreign countries is not raised in sufficient quantities in this country to meet domestic needs; and in addition to this the Secretary must find that there is an organized monopoly existing in foreign lands in respect of the product which they wish to buy.

Mr. Chairman, 10 years ago we had up in this House a similar bill; in fact, the bill which we have before us now is existing law with the exception of including imports as well as exports. When that bill was up to the same arguments were raised against the export exemption to the Sherman antitrust law. At that time the House of Representatives was Democratic. There was a Democratic President in the White House who recommended to the Congress that the Webb-Pomerene export bill be enacted by the Congress, and we did not even require in that act that a Secretary of one of the departments should issue any certificate. All they had to do was to form their organizations for the purpose of exporting goods.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTNESS. If I understand the gentleman's construction of the committee amendment it is that even as to rubber, potash, or sisal there must be a certificate from the Secretary of Commerce before the association or corporation may be formed.

Mr. DYER. Not only that but the Secretary of Commerce must find, as I have stated, that there is a scarcity in this country of the products which they wish to form the pool to import.

In other words, there is not a sufficient quantity in this country, and in addition to that that they must also find before he can issue the certificate that there is a combination or foreign monopoly for the purpose of enhancing prices to the domestic consumers of this country.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation is not for the purpose of benefiting anybody except the consumers. Nobody is to be benefited except the consumers.

Some gentlemen have said that it was only for the purpose of helping some big rubber manufacturers in this country. Mr. Chairman, in the Supreme Court there has been pending a case against the Sisal Sales Corporation. That was a corporation formed of foreign capital for the purpose of enhancing the price of sisal from which twine is made for the farmers. In that case in the Supreme Court, in which the Government of the United States endeavored to proceed against the Sisal Sales Corporation because it enhanced prices in this country, the Supreme Court in part said:

> Appellees have secured a monopoly of interstate and foreign commerce in sisal. The Comision Exportadora de Yucatan has become sole purchaser of sisal from producers and the Sisal Sales Corporation, sole importer into the United States. There is no longer any competition in the trade; excessive prices are arbitrarily fixed.

Mr. Chairman, that refers to sisal and has nothing to do with rubber. This bill is for the purpose of helping the farmers in getting their twine at a reasonable figure.

There was another important case in the Supreme Court of the United States that affected potash. There was a combination of the French and German groups to make potash excessive in price, and as the American people are the chief ones that use potash, as they are the chief users of sisal, as they are the chief users of rubber, they brought the question to the Supreme Court against these French and German companies that had the monopoly of potash.

As a result of that case it was discovered that the French Government itself owned a part of the stock of this potash combination. For that reason this Government could not proceed against that monopoly. They could not sue the French Government.

So, Mr. Chairman, we find the condition as it exists against potash and against sisal and our hands are tied when we attempt to go into the court against them.

This legislation, Mr. Chairman, is for the benefit of no one else except the American consumers. If there is any gentleman in this House who believes that a pool formed for buying rubber, potash, and sisal, or is to be formed, for the purpose of enriching themselves, the committee will welcome any amendment that will limit entirely these companies to operating purely for the expenses connected with the operation.

They did not say that they wanted to make any profit, they never claimed that they would make a dollar profit, but the bill says that they must sell to everyone in America who wishes to buy sisal, potash, or rubber at the same figures at which they themselves are able to purchase it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The combination has brought down the price of rubber according to the proponents of the bill without this legislation. Why, then, is it necessary to enact the legislation? In other words, this is legalizing an invalid combine.

Mr. DYER. The same principle is involved in this legislation, and the same reason is given as was given by the President of the United States when he asked us to amend the Sherman antitrust law to permit combinations to be formed for the purpose of export. They said there was some doubt in the minds of the Department of Justice and in the minds of different lawyers of this country as to whether or not the formation of a voluntary pool of that kind was a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. They said we want to make it clear in order that there may be no misunderstanding about it. That is why they wanted that amendment adopted, and why we wish this adopted.

In my judgment, I do not think there is any serious doubt about it. I have letters that come to the Judiciary Committee from distinguished lawyers advising that they thought it was necessary that this legislation be enacted. Two law firms, one of them headed by former Justice Hughes of the Supreme Court, and another law firm headed by John W. Davis, former Solicitor of the Department of Justice. They both said there was sufficient doubt about it to warrant Congress in making it clear as to importation as they did with reference to exportation.

Mr. Chairman, the question of whether the price of rubber has gone down or not is not a material question. We know that it has gone up under the combination that existed when foreign combines controlled raw rubber, and to-day it is controlled by the Dutch and British to all intents and purposes.

Mr. Raskob, testifying before the Judiciary Committee, said, in part:

Our committee realizing the great importance of this legislation, particularly as it deals with the so-called Sherman law, which has been on our statute books a great while, went to great trouble and great pains to notify all those we thought would be in any way interested and invite them into our conference. We have talked at great length with the National Grange people, the American Farm Bureau Association, the American Dairymen's Association; of course, with the rubber people, with the National Automobile Dealers' Association, the American Automobile Association, and also we have spent a very great deal of time with the Departments of Commerce, Agriculture, and with the Federal Trade Commission, and we employed two of the best law firms that we felt we could get, with the view of being able to have the whole group evolve some legislation that would give the American consumer the protection needed, so that the bill that is before your committee to-day, we think, is a bill that is prepared with the greatest care we could possibly have given it, and we feel that it definitely declares the right of manufacturers of rubber to combine their purchases and thus protect the American consumer against foreign monopoly, and at the same time we will be protected against importers using this power in any manner that tends to enhance prices or restrain trade, either in rubber or in manufactures therefrom. This protection we feel is amply covered in that portion of the amendment which reads as follows:

"Provided that such association does not either in the United States or elsewhere enter into any agreement, understanding, or conspiracy to do any act which artificially or intentionally enhances prices within the United States of commodities of the class imported by such association, or of products manufactured in whole or in part therefrom, or which otherwise substantially lessens competition within the United States, or otherwise restrain trade therein.

"No association engaged in such import trade shall discriminate in the sale of or refuse to sell such commodities which it may have for sale to anyone desiring to buy such commodities for use in manufacturing goods in the United States. Nor shall any such association be allowed to accumulate unreasonable stocks of such commodities and withhold the sale thereof for the purpose of artificially or intentionally enhancing the prices thereof."

We earnestly request that this legislation be expedited as much as possible, for the reason we feel the rubber situation is in a critical stage at this minute, due to the fact that under the restriction act the British plantations had their output reduced to 60 per cent for the past eight months, and this percentage will not be increased for several months to come. This 60 per cent will not be increased until the price of rubber rules at 42 cents a pound or more for a period of nine consecutive months from February 1, 1928. Should, however, the price of rubber rule at 48 cents a pound for any three consecutive months, then the restrictive provisions will be increased to 70 per cent, and should the price of rubber rule at 75 cents for any three consecutive months, the restriction figure will be lifted to 100 per cent. Following that, however, should the price of rubber fail to maintain at 42 cents for any consecutive period of three months, the restrictions would be immediately restored.

The demand for rubber is bound to continue to increase, and with the supply thus artificially curtailed through foreign monopolies the inevitable result is higher prices for rubber than would otherwise rule.

I have seen the rubber plantations where this raw rubber grows. I know the acreage that is involved and the vast amount of money that is involved in the growing of this raw rubber. I know that we are dependent in this country upon those countries that grow the raw rubber. We use over 70 per cent of all of the rubber grown in the world. If they are permitted to enhance the price even a fraction of a cent it makes a very great difference to us.

It is not a question of whether it is needed now or not. It may be needed, and if it is not needed, no pools will be formed, because no certificates would be issued. Mr. Raskob, a witness who appeared before our committee, is not a rubber grower. He has nothing to do with the manufacture of rubber. He is connected with the automobile business, and his only purpose is to bring rubber to a minimum price for the tire companies and the industries connected with it that use rubber. It is on that basis that we seek this legislation for the benefit of the American consumer of the products that I have mentioned. [Applause.]

Mr. Raskob, who is one of the best-posted and most-respected men in the automobile industry, further testifying, said:

May I take a minute to try to visualize the importance of the motor industry to the prosperity of our country? The motor industry ranks first in point of wholesale value of products among the industries of America. Slaughtering and packing comes second, steel and steel products third, and petroleum, which is, too, largely dependent upon the rubber industry, comes fourth.

This great industry is absolutely dependent upon rubber. The wholesale value of its product in 1926—the 1927 figures not yet being available—was about $4,700,000,000. The retail value was about $6,000,000,000. If we add to this the cost of building and maintaining the garages all over the United States, the cost of the good roads which are created largely by reason of the automobile development, we quickly arrive at a total of $10,000,000,000 of new wealth created annually largely by reason of the automobile. Visualize what $10,000,000,000 means. It is interesting to note this is just about the average annual value of farm crops in the United States during the past four years. Automobile users consume upward of 80 per cent of the total rubber consumed in the United States, and the United States about 70 per cent of the total rubber consumed in the world. It has been clearly shown that substantially all plantation rubber is grown under the British and Dutch flags, and the Stevenson Act is an attempt on the part of the British growers and Government to control the production of rubber with a view to controlling the price. The rubber consumption of the United States, I think, can be conservatively stated at 900,000,000 pounds, so that a cent a pound in the price of rubber means $9,000,000 to the American consumer.

During 1926 the motor industry of the United States produced 4,428,286 vehicles, having a wholesale value of $3,163,756,676.

In doing this employment was given directly or indirectly to 3,743,000 laborers and vast markets were established for all of the basic raw-material industries.

Virtually 500,000 motor vehicles were exported, having a value of around $500,000,000. Of the 27,000,000 vehicles in the world to-day, more than 90 per cent were manufactured in this country.

There are 22,000,000 motor vehicles registered in the United States, and their owners pay more than one-half billion dollars in special taxes, or more than enough to offset all of the current costs for the highways of general motor use.

Analyzing the employment of labor in the automobile industry, we find that there are so employed 3,743,000, as follows:

EMPLOYED DIRECTLY

Motor-vehicle factory workers	375,281
Parts and accessory factory workers	320,000
Tire-factory workers	100,000

This legislation has been indorsed by the following:

The Secretary of Commerce.

The Secretary of Agriculture.

The National Grange (800,000 members).

The American Farm Bureau.

The American Fertilizer Association.

Manufacturing Chemists' Association.

The Automobile Chamber of Commerce and all other like organizations.

The Country Gentleman, a farm paper, in its March edition has this to say about this bill:

American farm organizations have acted wisely in supporting the plan to legalize the pooled buying of rubber and other raw materials subject to foreign control. Farmers have a distinct stake in the matter. They are heavy users of rubber in truck and automobile tires, of sisal for binder twine, and potash for fertilizers, to mention three of the commodities involved.

To make such buying legal an amendment to the Webb-Pomerene Act is required. This act, passed in 1918, permits American manufacturers to form export associations or sales pools, without fear of prosecution under the antitrust laws, for the disposal of their products abroad. It was intended to enable American exporters to meet organized foreign competition. Since then organized foreign control of a number of raw materials used in large quantities in this country has developed. The amendment would simply extend legal sanction to organized buying by Americans to offset organized foreign selling policies.

The plan has already had a real tryout. During 1927 a $50,000,000 rubber-buying pool was in operation in this country and, by reason of its great bargaining power, apparently had an important effect on prices. According to testimony before a House committee, the difference between the high and low prices of rubber in 1925 was 84 cents a pound; in 1926 it was 55 cents a pound, but in 1927 it was only 9 cents a pound. This was the greatest stability in rubber prices in 20 years.

Since the United States uses around 900,000,000 pounds of rubber a year the cost of only a few cents fluctuation in prices is a very large item.

Similar savings, it is indicated, might be effected by the consolidated buying of sisal, potash, nitrates, coffee, camphor, and other commodities, wholly or in part subject to controlled foreign selling. Any savings gained would be likely to reach about every American pocket.

Mr. Chairman, I submit the following figures showing importations in connection with this legislation:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918, is amended to read as follows:

"That the words 'export trade,' wherever used in this act, mean solely trade or commerce in goods, wares, or merchandise exported, or in the course of being exported from the United States or any Territory thereof to any foreign nation; but the words 'export trade' shall not be deemed to include the production, manufacture, or selling for consumption or for resale, within the United States or any Territory thereof, of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or any act in the course of such production, manufacture, or selling for consumption or for resale.

"That the words 'import trade,' wherever used in this act, mean solely trade or commerce in crude rubber, potash, sisal imported, or in the course of being imported into the United States or any Territory thereof from any foreign nation, or in other raw materials, or products of nature in a crude or unfinished state which are certified by the Secretary of Commerce to be of a character not made, produced, or grown in substantial quantities within the United States, to be controlled by any foreign government, combination, or monopoly.

"That the words 'trade within the United States,' wherever used in this act, mean trade or commerce among the several States or in any Territory of the United States, or in the District of Columbia, or between any such Territory and another or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States.

"That the word 'association,' wherever used in this act, means any corporation or combination, by contract or otherwise, of two or more persons, partnerships, or corporations."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause. We have had four hours' debate upon this bill. The debate was entirely on the bill itself. The time was equally divided. The sponsors and supporters of this bill have utterly failed to make out even a prima facie case to justify the passage of the bill. On the facts as they exist there is no need for this legislation. The bill as it is drawn will not give the protection that its sponsors assure the House it will give to the consuming public of the United States. That being so, with the facts all fresh in your mind, gentlemen, there is no need of prolonging the agony. Let us vote to strike out the enacting clause and defeat the bill right now.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, in the debate on this bill there has been presented a situation which can be briefly summarized as follows:

There are some 15 or 16 different commodities which we must have and which are not produced in this country, but which are produced in substantial quantities in one or more of the producing countries. The exportation of these commodities is now subject to monopolistic control by these countries.

There are some 50 or 60 others susceptible of this control. As a result of this control of rubber, which is still in effect, the American consumer has had to pay, in a period slightly over two years' duration, $297,000,000 over and above the recognized fair price of 36 cents per pound. There have been set before you figures showing that as a result of the potash monopoly in France and Germany, the American farmer for a period of some 35 or 40 years has paid an excess price running into millions of dollars. There have also been submitted to you figures showing that in the last 15 years the American farmer has paid from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 in excess of a fair price to the governmental monopolies in sisal in Mexico.

That is the situation presented. To meet it we offer a simple plan which puts a weapon in the hands of the American consumer, so that he may more effectively combat the exactions of these monopolies. It is safeguarded by provisions taken from the terms and provisions of existing laws. These provisions have been on our statute books for years and have proven their worth and effectiveness. A further safeguard is the regulatory and visitorial power over these associations by the Federal Trade Commission. I also call your attention to three specific provisions placed there for the very purpose of preventing any abuse of the power granted:

First. There is a prohibition against any action by this association which enhances prices of the commodity or substantially lessens competition thereon.

Second. There is a provision against discrimination in the sale of such commodities.

Third. No such association is permitted to accumulate unreasonable stocks and withhold the sale for the purpose of enhancing the price. The moment when any of these provisions are violated, all of the provisions of existing law in reference to monopolies and restraints in trade go into effect.

There has been set forth a serious evil and a simple remedy properly safeguarded. The arguments against it are the same arguments that can always be proposed against any measure that is put forward with the idea of meeting a situation in a practical, statesmanlike way. "Status quo" is frequently an easy situation in which to be, but it is not the pathway of progress.

That is the situation. There is the evil. There is the simple remedy properly safeguarded. This the gentleman from New York seeks to eliminate without giving us an opportunity to debate the bill under the five-minute rule in order to perfect it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman admit that it requires perfecting?

Mr. NEWTON. I regret I can not yield. Something has been said here about there being now no necessity for this legislation, first, because the price is now down. The charts that I showed here yesterday showed that the price jumped up from 40 or 50 cents to $1.21 a pound in the space of a very few months, less months than from April to December, when Congress again convenes. Secondly, it is claimed that the British have now withdrawn the control. The Premier has merely stated his intention to withdraw it in November. He has the right to change his mind. He may do it or he may not do it. Even if he does do so, that does not mean that we are through with the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON. It has already been announced in the papers and is carried in the public press, and it precedes this announcement of the Premier, that there is to be a meeting of the only competitors of the British, namely, the Dutch, with the British producers. What is the purpose of that? Obviously to combine, to control, so that if the British can not do it alone the combination may do it.

Now, I submit, gentlemen of the House, that under these circumstances it is the business of this Government, it is the business of Congress, to do something to protect the American consumer from being subject to the exorbitant demands and exactions of these foreign-controlled monopolies. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. NEWTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 110, noes 70.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the enacting clause prevails.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. DYER and Mr. LAGUARDIA to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 124, noes 80.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and that the chairman report to the House that the committee has decided to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee do now rise and that the chairman report back to the House that the committee has decided to strike out the enacting clause. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LUCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8927) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having under consideration the bill H. R. 8927, reports that that committee has directed him to report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out. Those favoring the recommendation of the committee will rise and stand until they are counted.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the yeas and nays. Those who favor taking the vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Sixty gentlemen have arisen. The yeas and nays are ordered. Those favoring the action of the committee will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not know whether I can qualify. I do not know whether I was in the Hall or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea," but I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], so I withdraw my vote and vote "present."

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that my colleagues, Messrs. BOWLES, Foss, and MARTIN, are not present. If they were present they would vote "nay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. LAGUARDIA, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the enacting clause was stricken out was laid on the table.

ARTHUR C. LUEDER

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 8499, for the relief of Arthur C. Lueder, reported from the Senate committee on March 20, with two amendments merely correcting the form of the bill, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 8499 and agree to the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bill and the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ST. FRANCIS RIVER

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 9365, to legalize a bridge across the St. Francis River at or near Marked Tree, in the county of Poinsett, Ark., and agree to the Senate amendments. It is a bridge bill, and the amendments are not of any particular importance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 9365, and agree to the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bill and the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the purpose of the Senate amendments?

Mr. DENISON. I am sure I do not know. They merely provide for the striking out of small words, which are not of any great importance.

Mr. SCHAFER. Very often a small word may make a great deal of difference in a bill. I object until we know what the Senate amendments do.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER AT AUGUSTA, KY.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 5721, authorizing E. M. Elliott & Associates (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at Augusta, Ky., and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 5721, and agree to the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bill and Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DENISON. May I ask the gentleman from New York the reason for his objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Because it is E. M. Elliott.

Mr. DENISON. The Senate has stricken out the name of E. M. Elliott and granted the franchise to different parties.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is very easily done in a corporation, and I would like to look into the matter first.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I have conferred with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and also with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], who introduced the bill, and I am assured by both of them that the mayor of Augusta, Ky., who is going to secure the right to construct this bridge, will in no way be associated with Mr. Elliott. At the time the bill was introduced the information concerning Mr. Elliott's activities had not been disclosed. As soon as the information reached Mr. VINSON he immediately took steps to see that Mr. Elliott did not receive the grant.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On the assurance given by the gentleman from Missouri, and if he wants to assume the responsibility, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. DENISON. I intended to explain to the gentleman from New York that the Senate amended this bill by granting the franchise to the mayor of Augusta, who, I understand from the gentleman from Missouri, is not at all connected with E. M. Elliott.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Illinois is entirely correct. I was too hasty in making my objection. I should have reserved the objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will object until I have had an opportunity to look into this matter.

STONE MOUNTAIN COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been advised that it will be impossible for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] to serve on the Stone Mountain committee, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL] in his place.

BROOKSVILLE PLANT INTRODUCTION GARDEN

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate Joint Resolution 95, and, if necessary, to make a very brief statement in connection therewith.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 95, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell, or cause to be sold at private sale, to the Hernando Tobacco Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, for the consideration of $2, being the amount originally paid by the Government to the said Hernando Tobacco Co. for the lands hereinafter mentioned, all that tract or parcel of land situate in Hernando County, Fla., ordinarily referred to as the Brooksville Plant Introduction Garden, and more particularly described as follows: The south half southwest quarter southwest quarter of section 30, township 22 south, range 20 east, containing 20 acres, more or less; and the entire portion of the north half southwest quarter southwest quarter of section 30, township 22 south, range 20, which lies south of and adjacent to the county road running through said section and township, consisting of 15 acres, more or less, in the county of Hernando, State of Florida; together with the buildings and improvements thereon, which said tract or parcel of land with the buildings and improvements aforesaid is no longer needed for plant-introduction purposes, and to execute and deliver in the name of the United States and in its behalf any and all the contracts, conveyances, or other instruments necessary to effectuate and complete such sale.

SEC. 2. That the net proceeds from the sale of the aforesaid property be deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my recollection is an identical bill has been favorably reported to the House and possibly passed by the House.

Mr. DRANE. Not an identical bill. That bill was passed through an inadvertence and by consent of the Committee on Agriculture it will die over in the Senate. This joint resolution has passed the Senate.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has the resolution been before the House committee?

Mr. DRANE. Yes.

Mr. ADKINS. It was unanimously reported out by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

IRON GATES IN WEST EXECUTIVE AVENUE

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 359) authorizing the presentation of the iron gates in West Executive Avenue between the grounds of the State, War, and Navy Building and the White House to the Ohio State Archeological and Historical Society for the memorial gateways into the Spiegel Grove State Park, with Senate amendments, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 359, with Senate amendments, and agree to the Senate amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CROW INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3435) to authorize an appropriation from tribal funds to pay part of the cost of the construction of a road on the Crow Indian Reservation, Mont., which is identical with House bill 11276, which has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, what is this bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. This is a bill to take from the tribal fund of the Crow Indians $7,500 to be matched with $12,500 by the county for the construction of a road on the Indian reservation, which has been requested by the tribal council of the Indians.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Has the gentleman's committee unanimously reported the bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. The committee has unanimously reported the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation is hereby authorized in the sum of $7,500 from the tribal funds on deposit in the United States Treasury to the credit of the Indians of the Crow Reservation in the State of Montana to pay part of the cost of the construction of a road on said reservation between the towns of Hardin and St. Xavier, a distance of about 22 miles, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That before any money is expended hereunder the county of Big Horn or the State of Montana shall first set aside $15,000 to pay the remainder of the cost of said road.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. DENISON, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. McDUFFIE, for one week, on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet Monday. If this consent is granted, I intend to follow it with a request that on Monday the Private Calendar shall be in order as well as District of Columbia business, believing that there will not be District business to occupy the day; I also ask that the special order for to-morrow be continued over until Monday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] spoke to me yesterday touching the matter of adjourning over Saturday. I requested that the gentleman withhold the formal request until to-day. I understand it would inconvenience a number of Members who have built their plans about an adjournment over to-morrow if this request were objected to, so I shall not object; but I would like to throw out the hint, if I may, that it seems to me we are getting pretty near the time when we had better begin to work on Saturdays.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the District Committee call up the policemen's salary increase bill on Monday?

Mr. TILSON. I understand that it will not be called up.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will not object to this unanimous-consent request, but hereafter I shall object, because we have plenty of important legislation to keep this Congress in session on Saturdays as well as other week days.

Mr. TILSON. When the important legislation is ready I think all of us will agree that we should continue in session on Saturdays.

Mr. SCHAFER. Why not bring out a rule and set aside one Saturday to discuss amendment of the Volstead Act? [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] has indicated he wants a vote on it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet Monday, and also that it shall be in order to consider business on the Private Calendar on Monday, and such special orders as were in force for to-morrow will be postponed until Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE

SUNDAY, April 8, 1928

The Senate met at 3 o'clock p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die.

I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after this body be destroyed, yet in my spirit shall I see God, whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another.

I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, write, From henceforth blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. Even so saith the Spirit; for they rest from their labors and their works do follow them.

Let us pray. O Almighty God, with whom do live the spirits of those who depart hence in the Lord, and with whom the souls of the faithful after they have been delivered from the burden of the flesh are in joy and felicity: We yield Thee hearty thanks for the good and noble example of Thy servant, who having finished his course in faith now rests from his labors.

And O Merciful God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the resurrection and the life, in whom whosoever believeth, shall live, though he die, and whosoever liveth, and believeth in him, shall not die, eternally, who also hast taught us, by his holy Apostle Saint Paul, not to be sorry, as men without hope, for those who sleep in Him. We humbly beseech Thee, O Father, to raise us from the death of sin unto the life of righteousness, that, when we shall depart this life, we may rest in him; and that, at the general resurrection on the last day, we may be found acceptable in Thy sight, and receive that blessing, which Thy well-beloved Son shall then pronounce to all who love and fear Thee, saying, Come, ye blessed children of my Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world. Grant this, O Father, through Jesus Christ, our mediator and redeemer. Amen.

Unto God's gracious mercy and protection we commit you. May the Lord bless you and keep you. May the Lord make his face to shine upon you and be gracious unto you. May the Lord lift up the light of his countenance upon you and give you his peace both now and forever more. Amen.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR ANDRIEUS A. JONES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the order of the day.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 177) adopted by the Senate March 22, 1928, as follows:

Resolved, That Sunday, April 8, 1928, be set aside for memorial addresses on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. ANDRIEUS A. JONES, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 191) as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ANDRIEUS A. JONES, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public service.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to his memory the Senate, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, we assemble to-day to evidence our respect for and pay tribute to one who served with distinction to himself and honor to his State. He was one of the outstanding Members of this body. He enjoyed a host of friends and admirers throughout the Commonwealth.

ANDRIEUS A. JONES was born near Union City, Tenn., on May 16, 1862. He was the son of Rev. James H. W. and Hester A. A. Jones. After completing his course in the common schools of Tennessee, he acquired his bachelor of science degree at Valparaiso University in 1884, and in 1885 he acquired his bachelor of arts degree from the same institution. Immediately after thus completing his education, and responding to his belief in the usefulness of education, he engaged in the teaching profession in the State of Tennessee. Possessed with an ambition to rise above and out of the ordinary, he traveled westward in search of larger opportunities to promote his own welfare and, more important, to serve his fellow man in a larger degree. He settled at Las Vegas, N. Mex., and immediately resumed teaching there, occupying the position of superintendent of city schools. He was thus engaged from 1885 to 1887.

Yielding to a distinct call in that direction, he undertook the study of law, and was admitted to the bar of the then Territory of New Mexico in 1888, and to the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1894. Immediately upon entering the active practice he assumed a position of prominence among the profession in that entire section of the country on account of his connection with much of the important litigation in that area. In all of his active service in the legal profession he enjoyed the confidence, respect, and admiration of his fellow barristers and the members of the judiciary before whom he practiced. It was conceded by all that he was industrious, painstaking, careful, thorough, dependable, faithful, and successful. He possessed a peculiarly analytical mind, which invariably led him easily, quickly, and unerringly to the right conclusion. No man in the history of New Mexico ever enjoyed a higher standing in his profession. These qualities were contributing factors in his selection for the position of special United States attorney in the Territory of New Mexico, which position he held from 1894 to 1898. He was president of the State bar association in 1893. He was elected mayor of Las Vegas and served in that capacity during 1893 and 1894.

Throughout his life, Senator JONES was consistently a Democrat and was faithful in his devotion to the principles and tenets of his party, as declared by such outstanding leaders as Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson, in their respective periods. He attended many Democratic National Conventions as a delegate from New Mexico, and served as a member of the Democratic National Committee from 1908 to 1922. He was chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee in New Mexico from 1906 to 1908, and again was called to this important position of trust in 1911, when the first election under statehood was approaching. He guided the Democrats through that important campaign and, due largely to his foresight and judgment, most of the candidates were elected. In this connection, perhaps no citizen of New Mexico was more active or contributed more liberally and unselfishly to the efforts of the people of New Mexico to secure statehood than did Senator JONES. He made trips to Washington for the purpose of placing the cause in its true light before the Members of Congress. As a part of his magnificent service in securing the admission of the State into the Union, he had much to do with the preparation of the constitution of the State, and was foremost in the advocacy of many of its most important and beneficial provisions, responding to and serving the needs of the people in a wholesome way.

Immediately after statehood thus was obtained, he received the full vote of the Democratic members of the legislature of the State in 1912 for the office of United States Senator, but was unsuccessful because his party was in the minority. After so distinguishing himself by unselfish service to the progress and advancement of his State, because of his unusual legal acumen and intimate knowledge of the Western States, and particularly the public-land States, in all of their features, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, then Secretary of the Interior in 1913, summoned him to Washington, and without solicitation on the part of Senator JONES, tendered him the position of Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

This position was accepted by Senator JONES with full knowledge that it meant a great personal sacrifice on his part. His decision was prompted by his sense of obligation to serve the public. He assumed the arduous duties of this position at a time when they were unusually heavy. He soon distinguished himself by the unprecedentedly large volume and unparalleled high character of the service performed. He served in this position with credit and honor until 1916, when the Democratic Party of New Mexico called upon him to be its standard bearer in that important campaign as their nominee for United States Senator. He waged battle in his characteristic way, forceful and persuasive, and yet without sting or malice. He was elected by a decisive majority and qualified as a member of this body in 1917, and continued to serve here until his untimely death, which occurred on December 20, 1927, having been reelected in 1922 for another full term by an increased majority. His wife and two sons survive him and mourn his departure.

Mr. President, it was my good fortune to know Senator JONES intimately. I counted our friendship as being of the highest value during his life, and cherish it as one of my choice possessions since his departure. Association with him was to edify, elevate, purify, and enrich one. I have never known a man more industrious or who gave his time, talent, thought, and activity to public questions with greater zeal and devotion than he did. He was always fully prepared upon the problems with which he concerned himself. He never failed to sense the vital factors in an equation, and always held the welfare of the people to be of paramount importance. He was dedicated to the improvement of society, and distinguished himself while a Member of this body by the dignified, upright, fearless, sincere, honest, and faithful course he invariably pursued. No man ever entertained a higher concept of duty than he did. Neither did any one ever entertain the remotest thought of faithlessness on his part. He despised corruption in all its subtle forms and enticing overtures. He never failed to speak against these things when circumstances afforded him the opportunity to do so. He believed that—

To sin by silence when we should protest
Makes cowards out of men;
The few who dare must speak and speak again,
To right the wrongs of men.

He enjoyed the respect and confidence of his colleagues in the Senate without reference to party affiliation. He mastered some of the major problems of modern times, such as income taxes, legislation to raise revenue, and other features of economics in all their complex and complicated aspects. He was prominently affiliated with much legislation of gigantic importance during the World War and following it. He distinguished himself in his advocacy of the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. No man in the entire Republic is due more credit for bringing about the enactment of the women suffrage amendment, thus giving to the women of the country a heritage to which they had long been entitled than is Senator JONES. His espousal of the justice of that proposal had much to do with making the amendment a reality.

Although he was indefatigable in industry, possessed of great ability, was calm, forceful, persuasive, and earnest in the presentation of his views, he never offended nor gave cause for resentment on the part of his strongest foes, because they recognized that he was an honorable and upright advocate, never doing that which was unright or unbecoming.

Mr. President, it is my belief that one of the chief needs of the masses of to-day is the services of men like Senator JONES in public office from the highest to the lowest. Able, honest, and faithful administration in the affairs, both of the State and the Nation, contribute much to the peace, welfare, and happiness of the Commonwealth. The baneful results which necessarily emanate from a lack of it are obvious. Senator JONES did his part. Let others do theirs.

As indubitable evidence of the universal way in which he enjoyed the confidence, respect, and love of the people of New Mexico, men and women from the four corners of the State traveled long distances in wintry weather to attend the funeral rites over his remains at Las Vegas in order that they might pay their last respects to an upright citizen, a faithful, trusted, and true public servant, and a noted statesman. He gave himself without stint to the betterment of his fellowmen. His wage was the satisfaction of heart that he had met every duty and performed it well. His good name thus acquired will live far beyond the grave. He will survive in the hearts of his thousands of countless friends and admirers.

Mr. President, to those of us who knew him well, it is certain that his soul was enriched with the peace and quietude that surely guided him through the shoals of life and into the harbor of eternal rest. Because of the life he lived, he was unafraid of the moment when his footfalls should cease here and begin to sound in that other realm. His chief purpose and desire in life may be summarized in these words:

Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men go by;
They are good, they are bad,
They are weak, they are strong,
Wise, foolish, and so am I;
Then why should I sit in the scorner's seat,
Or hurl the cynic's ban;
Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
And be a friend to man.

Mr. President, no man in the history of this body was ever a truer friend to mankind than was Senator A. A. JONES.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, without time for reflection or preparation, I have been asked to say a word of tribute to our late colleague and friend whose merits are far greater than, under the circumstances, I can express. I am glad, however, of the opportunity to speak briefly on this occasion to honor his memory and to give evidence, even though inadequately, of the high regard that I had for his integrity, his ability, and his devotion to his country and to the people of his State.

I first became acquainted with ANDRIEUS A. JONES while he was Assistant Secretary of the Interior. I was impressed with his devotion to the duties of the position he then so ably occupied, and his intense desire to do that which was right with reference to all problems that came before him. Subsequently, when he became a Member of the Senate, my association with him became more intimate, and I quickly learned to regard him as an earnest, faithful, and conscientious public servant. No people and no State had a better representative on this floor than had the people and the State of New Mexico in Senator JONES. I think every one of his colleagues was impressed with his industry, with his conscientiousness, and with the splendid ability that he demonstrated in dealing with the many problems that claimed his attention.

I think the people possibly have an impression that their representatives are not always as conscientious as they should be; that they are not always as devoted to the interests of the people as the people have a right to expect. I sometimes think that we here on this floor, to a certain extent, are responsible for that feeling. I sometimes think that in debate we give expression to sentiments that might lead the people to entertain the opinion that this membership is not as conscientious as it should be and not as devoted to the public interest as it should be.

We ourselves know that the membership of the Congress of the United States is not only patriotic, is not only able, but that it is devoted to the best interests of the people of the Nation. We have our differences of opinion; we look at various questions which come before us from different standpoints; but

I myself do not believe that there can be found a body of men charged with great responsibility who are more earnest, more sincere, and more desirous of promoting the public good than are the Members of the Congress of the United States; and I do not think that there was a more conscientious or more patriotic Member of this body than Senator JONES of New Mexico.

He gave the best that was in him to the service of the people; he studied with great care and earnestness the complicated problems that came before him; and I believe that it was his sincere desire to do that which was right and that which was for the best interests of the people of this country. He and I differed very radically politically, yet I never had any doubt about his patriotism, about his conscientiousness, and his desire to promote the welfare of our people. This, I think, is one of the most precious memories that we can have of our late colleague and of the many other former colleagues who have passed away. We here in the Senate know that its membership is earnestly, conscientiously, and patriotically devoted to the interests of the people and the promotion of the welfare of our common country.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the long and honorable career of Senator ANDRIEUS A. JONES, of New Mexico, is closed. From his youth until the moment of his passing he labored for his State, his country, and his people ably, fairly, and with unswerving loyalty.

He served his country with the same patriotism, fearlessness, and self-sacrifice that idealized our "Unknown Soldier." Not all battles are fought upon the field or with instruments of destruction. Not all suffering comes from the wounds of weapons.

He did his duty with charitable fortitude, under the cruel and mistaken attacks of his opponents. He did his duty with rare modesty, amidst the applause of a grateful people. Like most pioneers who faced the hardships and dangers of a lawless country, he was brave, but patient, gentle, and tolerant at all times.

He was universally loved and admired by his fellow Senators. His ability as a lawyer and a statesman was recognized. His love of humanity, his kindly and forgiving disposition, his loyalty and sincerity, won the confidence and respect of all who knew him.

When the honor and safety of our Government was threatened, he voted to send our boys to war; but when the World War was terminated, he fought to protect the life, the health, and the comfort of our ex-soldiers.

He voted for war because it was his duty to vote for war; but he was always found in the forefront with those who were fighting for world peace, and for every cause that moved toward world peace.

He has ceased to serve with us; but as certainly as everything moves, as surely as everything evolves and moves forward, so will the soul of Senator ANDRIEUS A. JONES move forward, and somehow, somewhere, continue to serve.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the late Senator ANDRIEUS A. JONES was one of the finest characters it has ever been my good fortune to meet.

There was an intimacy between us of the closest nature. I made his acquaintance very shortly after his coming to Washington in 1912 to assume the responsible duties of Assistant Secretary of the Interior under Franklin K. Lane, and was at once brought into official and social contact with him. A friendship sprang up between our families. For eight years we occupied adjacent living apartments in the same building. We played golf together oftener than either of us ever did with any other player. We matched our skill from time to time at billiards and bridge. We were fellow members of the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, and labored together to subject to the public gaze the infamy of the leasing of the naval oil reserves. We made a sea voyage together to Panama. I had, accordingly, exceptional opportunity to learn of his virtues and to know his worth.

His private life, like his public career, was without blemish. He possessed a well-stored mind, and the equability of his temperament gave added strength to a judgment that had been fortified by wide reading and profound study. It was in this that his intellectual power lay, and to it is largely attributable the influence he exercised in debate.

It is trite to say that he was industrious to a high degree, when all who know recognize industry, unflagging industry, as a common virtue among Members of the Senate. Despite anything that may be said to the contrary, there are few, if any, drones in this body. But surely among those Members who in his time might be said to—

> Scorn delights, and live laborious days—

he was one of the foremost. He was not, however, by any means a recluse. On the contrary, his judgment was seasoned by contact with men of affairs in the course of an active business and professional life and by long and devoted service to the public. He was sagacious, safe, and sane, yet an ardent supporter of those policies which, for want of a better designation, have generally been referred to as progressive.

His finest work was in connection with revenue legislation, to which he made invaluable contributions, his most notable service being rendered as a member of the Committee on Finance. He had an amiable disposition, was rarely stirred to anger, and habitually thought well rather than ill of his fellows and of mankind in general. He exhibited unfailing devotion to the interests of his State and its people. While devotedly attached to the Democratic Party, to whose success he made notable contributions, he never sought in his official acts to advance its interests except by making it useful to the common cause.

From his State and the Nation he is entitled to receive, as we trust from the Divine Ruler he has received, the merited—

> Well done, good and faithful servant!

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, Senator JONES lived in the Fortunate Isles.

> What are the names of the Fortunate Isles?
> Duty, and love, and a broad content—
> These are the isles of the watery miles
> That God let down from the firmament.
> Duty, and love, and pleasant smiles—
> Ah, these, oh, friends, are the Fortunate Isles!

Mr. President, I doubt if any man in public life from the beginning of the Republic was endowed with a higher sense of civic duty. He had a passionate love of country.

My earliest recollection of Senator JONES dates to the holiday season of 1922. I had just been elected to the Senate, and came here to learn something of the obligations of the office. As I sat in the Members' gallery over there, studying this distinguished group and listening to the debates, I formed then for Senator JONES a feeling of respect that will endure forever. His earnestness, his zeal, his devotion to country, were apparent to me then, as they continued to impress me. As I came to know him personally, I realized more and more his love of and his devotion to country.

Senator JONES was a patient man, filled with the broad content that characterizes the man of force and character.

Senator JONES was a loving husband, a model citizen. His sweet smile was a benediction to his friends.

Indeed, my friends, Senator JONES lived in the Fortunate Isles. He lived his life, and by his devotion to duty made the world better for his living in it.

We mourn his death. His family, his friends, his State, his party, his country, have sustained an irreparable loss.

ANDRIEUS JONES was a good citizen. He adorns the Heaven to which he has gone.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, it is proper and fitting that we should gather here on this day of resurrection to pay tribute to our beloved friend and coworker whose earthly presence departed from us last December.

Easter Sunday is a reminder of the fact that while the things that are mortal perish, there is a resurrection of the immortal, and that certain immortal truths are eternal. The mortal ANDRIEUS A. JONES has passed on. His memory still lives. The things for which he stood in private and public life—truth, honesty, courage, and unflagging devotion to duty, love for and appreciation for his fellowman—still live, and will continue to live while this world has men like him to carry on the high ideals and practice the precepts of the Master whose resurrection we remember to-day.

ANDRIEUS A. JONES was a fine man, a fine citizen, a good public servant. His friends, who knew him intimately, loved him for his good qualities and his nobility of spirit. Those not privileged to know him so intimately honored and respected those qualities which carried him from the moderate circumstances and comparatively humble surroundings of his boyhood and youth to positions of power and great influence in the councils of his party and Nation.

ANDRIEUS ARISTIOUS JONES was born near Union City, Albion County, Tenn., May 16, 1862, attended the common schools and Bethel College, McKenzie, Tenn., and was graduated from Valparaiso University in 1885. He taught school, was principal of the public schools of Las Vegas, N. Mex., from 1885 to 1887, was admitted to the bar in 1888, and started the practice of law in Las Vegas.

From then until his death last December, the life of ANDRIEUS A. JONES was interwoven with the life of New Mexico. He was a leader in his community; served two years as mayor of Las Vegas; was president of the Las Vegas Chamber of Commerce; president of the New Mexico Bar Association. He served his people as district attorney; was special United States district attorney for some time. In 1896 he was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention; he was an effective worker in the ranks of the Democratic Party in his State, and 10 years later was chairman of the State central committee.

For 14 years he was Democratic national committeeman for New Mexico. He moved upward from State into national circles; was First Assistant Secretary of the Interior under Secretary Lane of President Wilson's Cabinet, resigning in 1916 when he became his party's candidate for the United States Senate, to which he was elected that year, and served until his death.

His was a long and useful life of service to his community, his State, his party, and his Nation. In my nine years' association with him in the United States Senate I was deeply impressed with his many lovable and worth-while qualities. I was proud to number him among my warmest friends. He possessed an unusual personality. He showed always a spirit of charity and tolerance that endeared him to all of us, and which in large measure was responsible for the high esteem in which he was held in his native State. To this spirit of charity and tolerance toward his fellows was coupled an unswerving fidelity to the principles in which he believed.

ANDRIEUS A. JONES believed in woman suffrage, and was a valient and stalwart fighter for suffrage in this Senate. While always an active and partisan Democrat on partisan issues, he numbered many close personal friends and admirers among the Republicans in the Senate and among the home folks.

We mourn his death, but our sorrow is alleviated by the fact that, in many respects, life was kind to Senator JONES. He was allowed to see the fruitions and realizations of the ambitions of a well-rounded and well-lived life. The hand of death touched him at the zenith of his career. Had he looked backward at that time he would have seen only continual progress forward and upward, not the inevitable slackening in efforts and accomplishment that comes as the wheel of life revolves more slowly after the zenith is past.

In closing I can not pay a more fitting tribute than to quote what was said of our late friend by the editor of the Las Vegas Daily Optic, who was privileged to know Senator JONES much more intimately than myself:

> New Mexico to-day paid proper tribute in last solemn rites at the grave of a faithful public servant, the late ANDRIEUS JONES, citizen, lawyer, statesman.
> In our little community the passing of Senator JONES has meant a distinct loss that is not to be met easily nor casually. He had during nearly 40 years of residence come to occupy a place in the hearts of his fellow townsmen that will be void for years to come. The respect in which he was held during his career is an achievement that can endure for his posterity and as an example for those who choose to rise above the ordinary walks of life in a small city such as ours.
>
> The accomplishment of high ideals in private life, public service, and in the pursuit of wisdom has been fortunate but not easily won for our late neighbor. He labored diligently for the honors which came to him, and held them by dint of prodigious effort which finally cost his life, years before he need have gone had he quitted his difficult post and retired to private life.
> We mourn the passing of a first citizen, a fine neighbor, and a most excellent public servant in the death of ANDRIEUS A. JONES.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, it has been a source of great pride to listen to the tributes which have been paid by fellow Senators to the memory of my illustrious predecessor in this body. It would be presumptuous on my part to add anything to what they have said were it not for the fact that I have known A. A. JONES for nearly 20 years as a constituent, and I believe I may say as a warm personal friend.

It is difficult under those circumstances to analyze the personality and characteristics of a man whom one has known so intimately and so closely.

In the last few years, Mr. President, my contact with Senator JONES was to a large extent connected with the cause of the ex-service man. A time came after the war when the average citizen was busily engaged in forgetting both the war and its victims. The parades, the brass bands, and the blare of trumpets were a thing of the past. The facile sentiment which in 1917 had maintained that every ex-service man was necessarily a hero had given place to an equally facile sophistry which maintained that there was no special debt due from the Nation to any man who had merely done his duty, which drew subtle distinctions between officers and enlisted men, between the physically and the financially disabled, between volunteers and drafted men, until, as a result, the ex-service man wondered whether the Nation had really forgotten the permanent handicap done to a whole generation of its manhood as a consequence of the service of that generation to its country.

I do not except any Member of this body when I say that through all that period A. A. JONES was as true a friend of the ex-service man as was to be found in Washington. From first to last he took the stand—and he made it his principal campaign plank—that as a Member of the United States Senate he had voted for war, he had voted for the selective service act—as a direct result of which he had lost his own dearly beloved son—and that so long as he had strength he would do justice to those towards whom he had become responsible.

It was natural that the ex-service men of his State, regardless of political affiliations, should have flocked to A. A. JONES as to their friend. It was not only the ex-service men, Mr. President; it was the unfortunate, the downtrodden, the helpless in every walk of life who instinctively turned to A. A. JONES as to "the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

Yet, Mr. President, it would be most misleading if I gave the impression that Senator JONES's stand on this or any other subject was even remotely influenced by its effect on his own political future. The man was entirely sincere. As I recall, the only issue that even the breath of calumny ever raised against him in his political campaigns was that he gave so much time to the general interests of the Nation that he had nothing left to devote to the special local interests of his own State. His answer was very simple. The interests of New Mexico were bound up with those of the Nation at large.

I remember once in a crowd that a voter from another State approached Senator JONES, and expressed to him his views on a matter of national legislation.

This he followed with an apology for the fact that he was not one of the Senator's constituents. "But you are one of my constituents," said Senator JONES. "I have been intrusted with the duty of drawing up legislation for all the people of the United States."

Mr. President, the people of my State have been, perhaps naturally, subjected to considerable criticism in the last few years. They have been maligned and traduced. I think that if Senator JONES were present at this time, he would join with me in saying that the fact that a man so modest, so intellectual, so well balanced, so remote from the average tricks of the campaigner, so sincere and devoted in his duty to the Nation as a whole, could be elected (as he was elected in New Mexico), by the largest majority ever given to any man in either political party, was in itself a refutation of any suspicion that there was anything wrong with the people of the State which he so splendidly represented.

Mr. President, you have heard from far abler lips than mine as to the personality and the character of Senator JONES. He was a man earnest in his convictions, yet I do not believe that in all the campaigns which he conducted in New Mexico, whether for himself or for any other man, he ever wounded the feelings of an opponent, that he ever said anything harsh or unjustifiable about men who disagreed with him, that he took advantage of any opportunities for the unfair manipulation of popular sentiment, or offended against his own dignity or the dignity of his high office.

> He was a man, take him for all in all;
> I shall not look upon his like again.

Mr. President, the United States can ill afford to lose men of this type. Such men are not to be found by means of legislation; they are not to be found by any constitutional or mechanical process. We should be thankful when we find them and join in mourning their loss.

On this Easter Day, when all of us are contemplating the time when the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, we may fittingly remember our friend, A. A. JONES, with the assurance that he who has been faithful unto death shall receive a crown of everlasting life.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the deceased Senator, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and the Senate (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, April 9, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

MONDAY, April 9, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who through Thine only begotten son, Jesus Christ, hast overcome death and opened unto us the gate of everlasting life, fill our souls with such a deep sense of the mystery of His resurrection that we may find new evidence of our Easter truth in these sighings and yearnings which can not be uttered, these dreams which the daylight can not melt, these shadows which never alight and never pass, these presences not felt and not to be put by, these airs from heaven so unresisting and so irresistible, these utterances of the soul which are never loud nor are ever silenced. Strengthen our valor in all conflicts of this mortal life, that we Thy immortal sons may come at last to the glory of Thy kingdom, where sorrow and sighing shall be no more and the tyranny of strife shall be overpast. Grant this for the sake of Him who is the resurrection and the life, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last and of Sunday, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

JAMES V. SUHR,
Post Commander.
LELAND L. WHITNEY,
Post Adjutant.

Mr. BINGHAM presented the memorial of the prison officials committee remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Hawes-Cooper bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(Prison officials committee: L. H. Putnam, chaiman, director of State institutions, statehouse, Providence, R. I.; Dr. L. M. Robinson, secretary, warden West Virginia Penitentiary, Moundsville, W. Va.)

A protest against the passage of Hawes-Cooper bill, House bill No. 7729, Senate bill No. 1940

To Members of Congress:

We respectfully petition you not to pass Senate bill 1940, introduced by Senator HAWES, of Missouri, nor H. R. No. 7729, introduced by Representative COOPER of Ohio.

In our deliberate judgment these acts are not only unnecessary, unwise, and unconstitutional, but if passed will destroy the penal system built up in a large majority of the States of the Union after years of experimenting with different systems and after the expenditure of millions of dollars by the various States.

In the Southern States cotton, grain, sugar cane, and livestock are produced on penal farms; in others turpentine and lumber are produced by convict labor; in others granite and marble are quarried and dressed, and agricultural limestone is quarried and crushed by convict labor; in Missouri and other Central States sheep, hogs, and cattle are raised and slaughtered on penal farms and the surplus sold; in Oregon flax raised on farms is processed by convict labor; in many States fruits and vegetables are raised and canned on penal farms and gardens; in the great wheat-growing States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Kansas, Indiana, Oklahoma, Missouri, and the two Dakotas for a great many years binder twine and farm implements have been manufactured by convict labor and sold to the farmers of those States; in other States scrub brushes, rat traps, rag rugs, and rag carpets are made by the criminal insane; in others work shirts, work clothing, overalls, work shoes, brooms, and mops are made by convict labor; in a few States coal is mined from State-owned coal mines by convict labor.

In some States juvenile offenders, male and female, are committed to houses of correction, schools of reform, orphanages, or convents, and are employed making knit goods, embroidery, baskets, books, and a variety of other wares.

The effect, if not the purpose, of the Hawes-Cooper bill is to utterly destroy the market for all these "goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part, by convicts or prisoners, or in any penal or reformatory institutions."

THE HAWES-COOPER BILL UNNECESSARY

There have been practiced in the United States in the past 130 years six systems of prison labor, namely: The lease system, the contract system, the piece-price system, the public account, the State-use system, and the public works and ways system.

Each system has and has had its advocates and critics, each system has both its advantages and disadvantages. The two systems which encountered the greatest amount of criticism have been the lease system and the contract system. The former in the earlier history of the Republic widely prevailed, but to-day it does not exist in any State; the contract system, which was formerly in extensive use, has gradually been superseded by other systems, and now exists in but few States, as the following table compiled by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, Bulletin No. 372, January, 1925, page 17, shows:

Per cent of convicts that were employed at productive labor under different systems in different years as shown by reports of this bureau

System	Year
	1885	1895	1905	1914	1923
Lease	26	19	9	4
Contract	40	34	36	26	12
Piece price	8	14	8	6	7
Public account			21	31	26
State use	[1] 26	[1] 33	18	22	36
Public works and ways			8	11	19
Total	100	100	100	100	100
Per cent of all convicts that were employed at productive labor	75	72	65	(2)	61

[1] Public account, State use, and public works and ways were inseparably combined.
[2] Not reported.

The individual States can be trusted to correct any defect in their penal systems, as the above table shows, and it is unnecessary for the Federal Government to attempt to coerce the States to adopt a particular system of penal management or labor.

THE HAWES-COOPER BILL UNWISE

All but four States of the Union utilize a combination of several systems of labor to meet their prison problems, and have found the practice satisfactory and in entire harmony with the public opinion and legislative policy of the respective States. To illustrate, most States utilize the State-use system in making clothing and shoes for inmates, the public works and ways system to build roads or public buildings, and utilize the surplus inmate labor under the public account, piece-price, or contract system to manufacture binder twine, produce cotton or livestock, or clothing, which is sold.

Under this system a great many penal institutions are self-sustaining, and many more are nearly so. Inmates are given a share of their earnings, which in many instances amounts for each inmate to as much as $1.50 a day which he may use for the support of his family.

Under this combined system, which prevails in more than 40 States, idleness in prison has been reduced to a minimum, inmates have been trained to habits of industry and thrift, prisoners have been rehabilitated and restored to society to live normal lives, and the taxpayers' burden has been lessened.

If the pending bill is passed and the States are compelled to adopt exclusively the State-use system of convict labor, we believe it will produce idleness instead of employment in prisons, chaos instead of order therein, will entirely destroy our markets and prison industrial organization, and will necessitate huge annual appropriations in the respective States, which heretofore have been unnecessary.

THE OSTENSIBLE OBJECTIVE OF THE HAWES-COOPER BILL

The proponents of the bill contend that the product of convict labor should not be sold in competition with outside labor, and that this competition is overcome by having convicts work for the State, or subdivisions, thereof, or manufacture articles to be used by the State, its subdivisions, or State institutions. In other words, they seek to compel the adoption of the State-use system of convict labor in every State.

The fallacy of this position is obvious. Do not school desks, chairs, blackboards, public printing and bookbinding, road signs, and automobile tags made by convict labor compete with outside labor just as truly as binder twine, work shirts, or overalls? The question answers itself.

The Hawes-Cooper bill seeks to divest prison-made goods of their interstate character and to subject them to the law of the State into which such goods may be transported.

Many years ago there were passed in 10 or 15 States acts requiring all goods made in penal institutions or produced by convict labor to be labeled "Convict made" before being exposed for sale, and in addition to this most of these acts required that a merchant handling convict-made merchandise must first obtain a license from the secretary of state before he be permitted to sell such merchandise, and the cost of the license varied from $100 to $1,000 per year. In addition to this the merchants handling convict-made goods in some of these States were required to keep a list of the persons to whom such goods were sold, and to file such lists with the secretary of state.
